

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. LAWYERS' REPORTS

ANNOTATED.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

LAFAYETTE BRIDGE COMPANY, Plff.
in Err.,
v.

Gena OLSEN, Admx., etc., of John Olsen, Deceased.

(47 C. C. A. 367, 108 Fed. 335.)

1. One engaged in constructing a bridge owes to his employees the duty of furnishing material for the temporary structure, which is reasonably sufficient to bear the weight to which it will be subjected; and for that purpose he is required to make proper inspection of the material furnished, to ascertain its soundness.
2. The duty owing by one engaged in constructing a bridge, to his employees, of inspecting the material furnished for the temporary structure to see that it is reasonably sufficient for its intended use, is not performed by directions to the workmen to pick out the best of mingled suitable and unsuitable material furnished.

3. An action for injuries to an employee of one engaged in constructing a bridge, which were caused by the breaking of defective material used in the temporary structure, cannot be taken from the jury where there is no evidence of inspection on the part of the master to ascertain whether or not the material furnished was suitable, and evidence produced indicates that proper inspection would have disclosed the defect.
4. The jury may make use of their own knowledge and experience, in considering conflicting evidence of experts upon the question whether or not proper inspection of material furnished by an employer for the temporary structure of a bridge which he was ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern Division of the Northern District of Illinois to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Jenkins, Circuit Judge:

The defendant in error brought suit to recover damages for the death of her intestate, John Olsen, who was drowned in the Illinois river through falling from a temporary bridge or scaffolding while in the service of the Lafayette Bridge Company. The declaration contains six counts. The first four counts substantially charge that the Lafayette Bridge Company, in charge of and engaged in constructing a bridge across the Illinois river near the city of Spring Valley, negligently suffered the bridge to be in bad and unsafe condition, and to be erected in an unsafe manner; that the bridge and the scaffolding used in its construction rested upon planks of insufficient size and strength, and insufficiently braced or supported to bear the weight placed upon them, by reason whereof one of the planks was broken, and Olsen, then pursuing a car laden with material for the bridge, was cast into the waters of the Illinois river, and killed. The fifth count, charging incompetency of the foreman, need not be stated, as no evidence was adduced to support it. The sixth count charges that the bridge company furnished for the scaffolding to be used in the erection of the bridge unsound, knotty, imperfect, weak, and insufficient planks and boards for the construction of the scaffolding, or temporary structure, to support the permanent structure of the bridge while in course of erection; and that one of the planks used broke, causing Olsen to be cast into the waters of the river and drowned. Concerning the principal facts of the case there is not much dispute, and they are, in the main, stated correctly in the briefs. In the spring of 1898 two spans of a bridge extending north and south over and across the Illinois river near Spring Valley were washed out. The bridge company contracted to put in a temporary structure for immediate use, and then to replace the two spans washed out with two spans of a steel bridge. In May, 1898, the bridge company constructed the temporary bridge, supported on rows of piles driven into the bed of the river, with a flooring of 3x12 inch pine boards. In July, 1898, the construction of the new bridge was commenced. The temporary bridge was removed, with the exception of the rows of piles, and possibly the crossbeams fastened across the top of each row. The planks were piled upon the uninjured part of the original bridge for use in making the floor of the permanent bridge. From this pile of planks, estimated at 230, were taken such as were needed to construct the false work or scaffolding, which was a temporary structure built upon the rows of piles, and the span of the new steel bridge rested upon it during the process of construction and until put together so as to become self-supporting, when the false work and piles were to be removed. In the construction of the permanent bridge the steel work was hauled upon the temporary bridge to the point where it was to be used on a hand car pushed upon one of the spans of the new bridge. Each span was about 200 feet in length, and consisted of 10 panels, each panel being 19 feet 10 inches in length. At the time of the accident the north span, including the laying of the floor, and the steel work of four panels of the south span, had been completed. Work was then being done on the second panel from the north end of the south span. The flooring of the temporary structure on that part of the bridge had been necessarily torn up. A track was made on which to run the car upon which the steel was hauled to the point where it was to be used. In the panel where the accident occurred there were two planks upon which the I-beam rested on the west or down-stream side. They were designed to extend the distance between two bents, about 17 feet; but for a distance of about 8 feet from the north piling there was but one plank, the top plank extending only to a point 8 feet from the north piling, the other end of it extending over a portion of the panel immediately south. On the evening before the accident the car was loaded with two steel chords each 19 feet long, and each of the weight of 925 pounds, placed lengthwise on the car. The car was 8 feet long and 4 feet wide, and weighed 300 pounds, and was pushed to the edge of the completed span, and there left for the night. Upon resuming work in the morning, four or five men, including the foreman and Olsen, began to push it along the track to the place desired. When the car had gone a distance of about 15 feet, the lower one of the planks supporting the I-beam which in turn supported a portion of the track and load, broke, causing the track to sag, producing displacement of the track and boards at that point. Immediately afterwards Olsen was seen in the river, coming near to the surface of the water, but he sank again, and was drowned, his body being recovered about an hour afterwards. The plank that broke was defective, having in it a curl in the grain of the wood at the point where it broke which weakened it, and rendered it insufficient to support the weight placed upon it. It had been in use in the floor of the temporary bridge, and was a 3x12 inch pine plank, and new when put into the temporary floor, where it had been in use from two to three months. It had been

I. Introductory.

In a note recently published in this series the cases bearing upon the representative capacity of employees, in so far as it is predicated upon the nature and extent of the control exercised by them over the injured person, were reviewed and analyzed at considerable length.

The following dissertation is intended to show the results of the application of another theory which produces results sometimes coincident with, and sometimes different from, those which are obtained by the application of the principles there discussed,—the theory, namely, that the question whether a delinquent servant was or was not a vice principal as regards the injured person is ultimately determinable by the character of the act which caused the injury.

The test of liability is not the safety of the place or appliance at the time of the injury, but the character of the duty, the negligent performance of which caused the injury. Sofield v. Guggenheim Smelting Co. (1900) 64 N. J. L. 605, 50 L. R. A. 417, 46 Atl. 711.

The true rule "makes the character of the act or omission wherein the negligence exists the test of the master's responsibility therefor." McElligott v. Randolph (1891) 61 Conn. 157, 22 Atl. 1094.

The test must always be whether the negligent act or omission was in discharge of the master's, or the servant's duty. Curley v. Hoff (1899) 62 N. J. L. 758, 42 Atl. 731.

it was the duty of the principal to do. Ross v. Walker (1891) 139 Pa. 42, 21 Atl. 157, 159.

The controlling consideration in determining whether an alleged negligent fellow servant occupied the position of vice principal is whether the act performed, or duty omitted, is one which is charged by the master upon the servant. New Pittsburgh Coal & Coke Co. v. Peterson (1893) 136 Ind. 898, 35 N. E. 7. Master held not liable for the negligence of a foreman in starting machinery while the plaintiff was working in an elevator which he had been ordered to clean.

See also the extracts given in II. b, infra.

It may be observed in this place that the formal adoption of the principle is of comparatively recent date, the first case in which it was explicitly enunciated being Elke v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1873) 53 N. Y. 549, 18 Am. Rep. 545.

In Wright v. New York C. R. Co. (1862) 25 N. Y. 562, the question whether the negligence of an agent intrusted with the function of hiring a servant was that of a vice principal was apparently viewed as debatable.

The practical effect of the theory is that the defense of common employment is excluded or allowed to prevail according as the delinquency in question was or was not a breach of what the law regards as a "direct, personal, and absolute obligation, from which nothing but performance can relieve" the master. The phrase as quoted is taken from Prevost v. Citibank's Ice & Refrigerating Co. (1899) 185 Pa. 617, 40 Atl. 88.

The subjoined cases, arranged according to states, are designed merely to indicate the present territorial limits of this theory, so far as it has actually received judicial recognition. The separate lists of authorities do not pretend to be exhaustive as regards each particular jurisdiction.

taken out with the rest of the planking, and placed at the north end of the bridge in a pile, for use as occasion might require. Olsen had assisted in removing and piling up these boards and in taking the planks from the pile and laying them upon the structure. The material was furnished by the bridge company. The work was in charge of one Luke, who was the sole representative in the state, of the bridge company, hiring, paying, and discharging the men, doing all the buying and all the paying. Olsen was a common laborer, principally engaged as a teamster and roustabout. He did not work on the temporary structure, the uncompleted part of the bridge, but, under the direction of Luke, assisted in hauling the planks to the point desired. It is assigned for error that the court erred in its refusal to direct a verdict for the defendant; that it erred in the admission of evidence; that it erred in its refusal to instruct and in its instructions to the jury, as sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

Argued before Woods and Jenkins, Circuit Judges, and Bunn, District Judge.

Messrs. George F. Haywood and W. T. Irwin, for plaintiff in error:

Olsen was a fellow servant of the foreman of defendant.

An employee may be, while engaged in the performance of a particular work, both a vice principal and a fellow servant. With reference to some of his work and duties he may be a vice principal, and while doing other work under the same employment and on the same piece of work he may be a fellow servant.

The foreman was assisting in the particular work that the other men were doing at the time of the accident. During the entire construction, not only of the false work, but of the permanent bridge, he worked as a laborer with the other men.

J. M. Luke was not an official of the company, but a foreman limited to the particular piece of work upon which he was at any one time engaged. He had charge of a gang of laborers, and he worked with them. He was a fellow servant of plaintiff's decedent at the time the defective plank was put into use, and during the work upon the bridge from that time up to and including the time of the injury of plaintiff's decedent.

The liability of the master does not depend upon the grade or rank of the employee whose negligence causes an injury to another employee, but upon the character of the act in the performance of which the injury arises.

In some respects the test thus furnished has greatly simplified the subject, and tempered the harshness of the doctrine of common employment. But, on the other hand, it has created several new and extremely embarrassing problems, and has even, by being treated as the only admissible gauge of liability, operated so as to narrow the servant's rights of recovery.

See note to O'Neil v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900; Minn.) 51 L. R. A. 593-599.

As to the difficulty which is frequently experienced in distinguishing between the cases referable to this conception and those based upon the official position of the delinquent, see Id. 587.

II. Master liable for any negligence which involves the breach of one of his personal duties.

a. Generally.

The principle stated in the preceding subdivision will, in the first place, be considered under the form which it assumes when it is treated as constituting a reason for excluding the defense of common employment.

For the purposes of the application of that principle it is assumed that an implied incident of the contract of employment is that the master undertakes, as regards the servant, certain obligations which are spoken of as "personal" duties (Schaub v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1891) 106 Mo. 87, 16 S. W. 924); "positive duties" (Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh (1893) 149 U. S. 368, 37 L. ed. 772, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914; Hess v. Rosenthal (1896) 160 Ill. 621, 43 N. E. 743); "personal, positive" duties (Lewis v. Seifert (1887) 116 Pa. 628, 647, 11 Atl. 514); "duties which the master owes personally and absolutely to his servants" (Lindvall v. Woods (1889) 41 Minn. 212, 4 L. R. A. 793, 42 N. W. 1020); "duties which a master owes, as such, to a servant entering his employment" (Northern P. R. Co. v. Peterson (1896) 162 U. S. 346, 54 L. R. A.

Crispin v. Babbitt, 81 N. Y. 516, 37 Am. Rep. 521; Beesley v. F. W. Wheeler & Co. 103 Mich. 196, 27 L. R. A. 266, 61 N. W. 668; Wood, Mast. & S. pp. 897-899.

The rule that the employer must furnish his employees a reasonably safe place to work has no application in the case at bar. In this case the employees of the defendant were employed to make the place upon which they were to work.

Bedford Belt R. Co. v. Brown, 142 Ind. 666, 42 N. E. 359.

Olson assisted the foreman in laying the track by selecting the plank.

Where the danger is equally open to the observation of both the master and the servant, both are upon common ground, and the master is not liable, as a general rule, for resulting injuries.

Evansville & R. R. Co. v. Henderson, 134

40 L. ed. 994, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 843; or "absolute, personal, duties" (Minneapolis v. Lundin (1893) 7 C. C. A. 344, 19 U. S. App. 245, 58 Fed. 525).

The existence of such duties being predicated, it follows, as a necessary corollary from the quality ascribed to them, that the master must, at his peril, see that they are discharged with reasonable care, whether he undertakes their performance himself, or employs an agent to perform them in his stead. The judicial statements of the doctrine thus deduced are couched in extremely varied phraseology, but may be conveniently classified under a few main groups. So far as the actual liability of the employer is concerned, it is, of course, quite immaterial from which standpoint the position of the inspector is considered, and, as might be expected, a court is apt to pass from one form of expression to the other in the course of the same discussion. They all connote the conception that, of the duties imposed by the law upon an employer, "he cannot relieve himself except by performance." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Seeley (1894) 54 Kan. 21, 37 Pac. 104.

b. Various forms in which the master's responsibility is stated.

In one group of statements prominence is given to the conception that the character of the negligent act is, in every case, the test of vice principalship. The question turns rather on the character of the act than on the relation of the employees to each other. If the act is one done in the discharge of some positive duty of the master to the servant, then negligence in the act is the negligence of the master; but if it be not done in the discharge of such positive duty, then there should be some personal wrong on the part of the employer before he is held liable therefor. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh (1893) 149 U. S. 368, 387, 37 L. ed. 772, 781, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914.

Whether the master is liable for the negligence of a servant intrusted with the discharge of one of the absolute, personal duties which the law imposes on him, is determined in any given case by the nature of the act in the performance of which he was guilty of the negligence. If he was engaged in discharging an absolute duty of the master, the latter is liable; otherwise he is not. Minneapolis v. Lundin (1893) 7 C. C. A. 344, 19 U. S. App. 245, 58 Fed. 525.

In every case the position of vice principal must be determined by ascertaining whether the act performed or duty omitted is one the doing of which is charged upon the master and dele-

Ind. 636, 33 N. E. 1021; Abbott v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. 150 Ind. 498, 50 N. E. 729.

If there was negligence on the part of the foreman in the use of this plank, there was also negligence on the part of the defendant Olsen, who helped to select it.

gated to the servant. In other words, whether the servant has been put in the place of the master as to the particular service performed or omitted. If he has, and his act or omission, while in that particular service, involves a duty owing by the master to the servant, the master is liable for injury resulting from such act or omission, if the injured servant is free from negligence, and has not assumed the hazard. New Pittsburgh Coal & Coke Co. v. Peterson (1894) 136 Ind. 398, 35 N. E. 7.

Whenever it is sought to hold the master liable for the act or neglect of his foreman, the question to be first considered is whether the negligence complained of relates to anything which it was the duty of the principal to do. If it does, then the principal is liable; for he must see at his peril that his own obligations to his workmen are properly discharged. If he does not he is not liable; for all his workmen are liable to each other for the consequences of their negligence, respectively, and he does not insure them against each other by the mere fact of employing them. Ross v. Walker (1890) 139 Pa. 42, 21 Atl. 157, 159.

The test as to whether an employee is the representative of the master is not whether such employee has the power to employ or discharge hands or to purchase or change machinery, for, while these are some of the duties of the master, they are not all of his duties, and hence an employee who is not intrusted with either of these powers may still be the representative of the master. The true test is whether the person in question is employed to do any of the duties of the master. Gunter v. Graniteville Mfg. Co. (1882) 18 S. C. 270, 44 Am. Rep. 573.

The question as to whether the relation of fellow servants exists in a given case is, in our opinion, determined by an inquiry into the nature of the service at the particular time in question. If, at the time the offending servant performed the act by which another servant was injured, he was in the performance of a duty which the master owed to his servants, he was not a fellow servant; for the rule is fundamental that the master cannot rid himself of the duty he owes to his servants by delegating his authority to another, and if he attempts to do so, the person to whom he delegates the power to act is a vice principal, and not a fellow servant.

On the other hand, if at the time of the alleged negligence the servant was not engaged in the performance of a duty which the master owed to his servants, but was in the discharge of a duty which the servant acting owed to the master, he will be held to be a fellow servant with others engaged in the same common business. L. R. A.

ness, and the master will not be liable for any injury inflicted upon such fellow servant by reason of his negligence. Justice v. Pennsylvania Co. (1892) 130 Ind. 321, 30 N. E. 803.

A railroad corporation may be controlled by competent, watchful, and prudent directors, who exercise the greatest caution in the selection of a superintendent or general manager, under whose supervision and order its affairs and business, in all of its departments, are conducted. The latter, in turn, may observe the same caution in the appointment of subordinates at the head of the several branches or departments of the company's service. But the obligation still remains to provide and maintain, in suitable condition, the machinery and apparatus to be used by its employees,—an obligation the more important, and the degree of diligence in its performance the greater, in proportion to the dangers which may be encountered. Those, at least, in the organization of the corporation, who are invested with controlling or superior authority in that regard represent its legal personality; their negligence, from which injury results, is the negligence of the corporation. The latter cannot, in respect of such matters, interpose between it and the servant, who has been injured without fault on his part, the personal responsibility of an agent who, in exercising the master's authority, has violated the duty he owes, as well to the servant as to the corporation. Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. (1879) 100 U. S. 213, 218, 25 L. ed. 612, 615.

In another group of statements an affirmation of the crucial importance of the character of the negligent act appears in connection with an assertion that the rank, title, or official position of the offending servant, and the degree of control exercised by him over the plaintiff, are not material factors in the determination of the master's liability.

The true rule is to hold the corporation liable for negligence in respect to such acts and duties as it is required to perform as master, without regard to the rank or title of the agent intrusted with their performance. As to such acts the agent occupies the place of the corporation, and the latter is liable for the manner in which they are performed. Filke v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1873) 53 N. Y. 549, 13 Am. from liability to a servant who is injured by the omission to perform the act or duty, or by its negligent performance, whether the nonfeasance or misfeasance is that of a superior officer, agent, or servant, or of a subordinate or inferior agent or servant to whom the doing of the act, or the performance of the duty, has been committed. In either case, in respect to such act or duty, the servant who undertakes or omits to perform it is the representative of the master, and not a mere co-servant with one who sustains the injury. The act or omission is the act or omission of the master irrespective of the grade of the servant whose negligence caused the injury, or of the fact whether it was or was not practicable for the master to act personally, or whether he did or did not do all that he personally could do by selecting competent servants, or otherwise to secure the safety of his employees. It is sometimes difficult to determine what is the master's duty, within the rule. But when it is ascertained that the negligence by which an employee is injured relates to this duty, then there is no middle ground, and the case cannot be determined upon any distinction founded upon the particular grade, office, or function of the negligent servant or agent."

The true test whether an employee occupies the position of a fellow servant to another employee, or is the representative of the master, is not to be found from the grade or rank of the offending or injured servant, but it is to be determined by the character of the act being performed by the offending servant, by which another employee is injured: or, in other words, whether the person whose status is in question is charged with the performance of a duty which properly belongs to the master. Schroeder v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. (1894) 103 Mich. 213, 29 L. R. A. 321, 61 N. W. 863.

The test whether or not an employee by whose negligence another employee was injured was a fellow servant of the latter is not "a difference in rank, or the power to control and direct or discharge from service the employee injured," but "whether the act or omission resulting in injury involved a duty owing by the master to the injured employee." Robertson v. Chicago & E. R. Co. (1896) 146 Ind. 486, 45 N. E. 655.

For failure or negligence in the discharge of these personal duties of the master resulting in injury, the master is liable whether he acts in person or by other servants. If he acts by servants in such cases, it makes no difference as to the grade of the servant. The servant is identified with the master. The master's duties are cast upon him, and for his default the master is liable; and in these cases the doctrine of "fellow servants," so called, has no application whatever. Schaub v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1891) 106 Mo. 87, 16 S. W. 924.

It is not the law that the mere fact that an appliance furnished by the master to his servants to be used by them in the prosecution of their work has been constructed by one who has been a fellow servant engaged in the same kind of work with the servant who is injured exonerates the master from liability from the consequences of a defectiveness of the appliance. On the contrary, the law is that the duty of the master to furnish reasonably safe tools, machines, and appliances to his servants, to be used by them in the prosecution of the work assigned to them, is absolute in its nature and personal to the master, to the extent of using due care to accomplish the end named. As this duty is personal to the master, it is entirely immaterial to what grade of servants or employees he delegates its performance. He may delegate it to his general agent, who has the general superintendence of his work and the duty of employing and discharging hands, and the entire control over their movements and operations; or he may delegate it to one of the common laborers who are to use the appliance. He may delegate it to a trained mechanic, or he may select a laborer utterly without skill. In either case, as the duty is personal to him, he becomes responsible for its proper performance to the extent of using reasonable care and diligence to the end that it is properly performed. In any of these cases the particular agent, employee, or servant, to whom he delegates this duty, becomes, for that reason, and as to it, his vice principal, and is taken out of the category of fellow servants in respect of any other servants who are injured through the defectiveness of the appliance. Jones v. St. Louis, N. & P. Packet Co. (1891) 43 Mo. App. 398.

Jenkins, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

We have held in Reed v. Stockmeyer, 20 C. C. A. 381, 34 U. S. App. 727, 74 Fed. 186, that it is the duty of the master to use ordinary care to furnish appliances reasonably safe for the use of servants,—such as, with reasonable care on his part, can be used without danger save such as is incident to the business in which such instrumentalities are employed; that it is also the duty of the master to use like care to provide a safe place in which the laborer may perform his work, and to keep it in a suitable condition. These duties may not be foregone, and, when delegated to be performed by another, that other is a vice principal, and quoad hoc represents the principal, so that his act is the act of the principal. That other may have a dual character,—vice principal with respect to the duty due from the master to the servant, and co-servant with respect to his acts as a workman. In case of injury, the question of the liability of the master turns rather on the character of the act than on the relations of the servants to each other. If the act is in the discharge of some positive duty owing by the master to the servant, then negligence therein is the negligence of the master; otherwise, there should be personal wrong on the part of the master to render

Ell v. Northern P. R. Co. (1891) 1 N. D. 336, 12 L. R. A. 97, 48 N. W. 222; Daves v. Southern P. Co. (1893) 98 Cal. 19, 32 Pac. 708, Following Collier v. Steinhart (1875) 51 Cal. 116.

In another group of statements it is laid down that the mere employment of a competent person to perform the duty which was omitted is not sufficient to absolve the master from responsibility. Van Dusen v. Letellier (1889) 78 Mich. 492, 44 N. W. 572.

In another group we find a simple affirmative of the representative character of the employee who is intrusted with the performance of one of the nondelegable duties.

If, instead of personally performing these personal obligations, the master engages another to do them for him, he is liable for the neglect of that other, which, in such case, is not the neglect of a fellow servant, no matter what his position as to other matters, but is the neglect of the master to do those things which it is the duty of the master to perform as such. Northern P. R. Co. v. Peterson (1896) 162 U. S. 346, 40 L. ed. 994, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 843.

If a person employs another to perform a duty which he would have to discharge if another were not employed to do it for him, such employee, as to that service, stands in the master's stead with relation to other persons. Moore v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. (1885) 85 Mo. 588.

At common law, whenever the master delegates to any officer, servant, agent, or employee, high or low, the performance of any of the duties above mentioned, which really devolve upon the master himself, then such officer, servant, agent, or employee stands in the place of the master, and becomes a substitute for the master,—a vice principal,—and the master is liable for his acts or his negligence to the same extent as though the master himself had performed the acts or was guilty of the negligence. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Moore (1883) 29 Kan. 632.

It is clear, upon principle, that where the duty rests directly on the master, and he authorizes an agent or servant to perform that duty, he is bound to answer to a servant injured by the negligent performance of the duty. Indiana Car Co. v. Parker (1885) 100 Ind. 181.

One who is placed in charge of a force of men, and whose duties are limited to carrying on the work or directing it, whether actively assisting therein or not, and who is invested with no authority, and charged with no duty, in furnishing places or appliances for the work or in the employment or retention of employees, is himself usually a mere coemployee. His duties require him to use, or superintend and direct the using of, places and appliances and to control employees furnished by the master. If, however, he is given additional authority, and is charged with the duty of furnishing places to work and appliances for the work, and is authorized to employ and discharge operatives, he is, as to such things, not a coemployee, but speaks and acts as the master. Nall v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. (1891) 129 Ind. 280, 28 N. E. 183, 611.

If the master has delegated to a servant or employee the care and management of the entire business, or a distinct department of it, the situation being such that the superior servant is charged with the performance of duties towards the inferior servant which the law imposes upon the master, then such superior servant stands in the place of the master, and the rule of respondent superior applies. Harrison v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. (1890) 79 Mich. 409, 7 L. R. A. 623, 44 N. W. 1034.

Where injuries are caused by negligence of a servant who is charged with the performance of duties which by law it is incumbent on the master to perform, in legal contemplation his negligence is the negligence of the master. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McKenzie (1885) 81 Va. 71.

In Riley v. West Virginia C. & P. R. Co. (1885) 27 W. Va. 145, the correct rule on this subject, as deduced from the more recent and better-considered American cases, was said to have been that stated in Wood on Master & Servant, § 438, as follows: "Whenever the master delegates to another the performance of a duty to his servants which the master has impliedly contracted to perform in person, or which rests upon him as an absolute duty, he is liable for the manner in which that duty is performed by the middleman whom he has selected as his agent, and, to the extent of the discharge of those duties by the middleman, he stands in the place of the master, but as to all other matters he is a mere co-servant; and the question is not, whether the master reserved any oversight or discretion to himself, but whether he did in fact clothe the middleman with power to perform his duties to the servant injured."

See also Corcoran v. Holbrook (1875) 59 N. Y. 517, 17 Am. Rep. 869; Loughlin v. State (1887) 105 N. Y. 159, 11 N. E. 371; Lindvall v. Woods (1880) 41 Mich. 212, 4 L. R. A. 793, 42 N. W. 1020; Mackey v. Baltimore & P. R. Co. (1890) 8 Mackey, 282.

In another group of statements the nondelegable quality of the master's personal duties is emphasized. That is to say: "No duty required of him [the master] for the safety and protection of his servants can be transferred so as to exonerate him from such liability." Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert (1884) 116 U. S. 642, him liable. These principles we understand to be established by the ruling of the ultimate tribunal. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 37 L. ed. 772, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914; Central R. Co. v. Keegan, 160 U. S. 259, 40 L. ed. 418, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269; Northern P. R. Co. v. Charless, 162 U. S. 359, 40 L. ed. 999, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 848; New England R. Co. v. Conroy, 175 U. S. 323, 44 L. ed. 181, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 85. This duty of the master owing to the servant is not absolute, but relative, measured by the nature and character of the employment and the nature of the location and the surroundings. In the case at bar the work to be done was accompanied by danger arising, not only from location, but from the great weight to be supported. In furnishing plank to be used for such support, the master owed to the servant the positive duty of furnishing material reasonably fit for the purposes of the contemplated use. In the reasonable discharge of his duty he should ascertain if the plank furnished were reasonably sufficient to bear the weight to which they were to be subjected. That was matter of technical knowledge and experience, which could not be left to the judgment of a common laborer. It was also the duty of the master to have proper inspection of the lumber furnished, to ascertain its soundness, for upon that depended its breaking strength and its ability to sustain the ordinary working strain to which it would be subjected. It was incumbent upon the master, under the circumstances of this case, and in view of the peculiar defectiveness of the plank that broke, to have shown that such inspection was had before the employment of the material in work in which

The nonfulfilment of a positive duty cannot be excused by the delegation of its performance to another. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. La Rue (1897) 27 C. C. A. 363, 55 U. S. App. 20, 81 Fed. 148.

An employer is not relieved from responsibility to an employee who has been injured in consequence of his failure to make the working place reasonably safe, by proof that he employed a competent superintendent or foreman, supplied him with necessary appliances, and gave him all needful instructions for the purpose. *Baird v. No duty belonging to the master to perform for the safety and protection of his servants can be delegated to any servant of any grade, so as to exonerate the servant from responsibility to a co-servant who has been injured by its non-performance. Mann v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1883) 91 N. Y. 495.

A master is never exonerated by the negligent omission of subordinates to perform duties which are imposed on him in his character as master, resulting in injury to his employees. Bailey v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. (1893) 139 N. Y. 302, 34 N. E. 918.

In Ford v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1891) 124 N. Y. 493, 12 L. R. A. 454, 26 N. E. 1101, the court, after stating that a want of care on the master's part may appear from various derelictions of specific duties, said: "These are the master's duties, and responsibility cannot be evaded by their delegation to agents. As to such acts the agent occupies the master's place, and the latter is deemed present and liable for the manner in which they are performed."

The duty of the master to exercise reasonable care that the machinery, appliances, and place to work supplied to the servant are reasonably safe is personal, and cannot be delegated to another so as to relieve the master from liability for its nonperformance. Edward Hines Lumber Co. v. Ligas (1898) 172 Ill. 315, 50 N. E. 225, Affirming (1897) 68 Ill. App. 523.

The master "cannot avoid the liability by deputing another to perform these duties in his stead." Brown v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. (1880) 27 Minn. 162, 38 Am. Rep. 285, 6 N. W. 484.

While the master may delegate the [i. e., a personal] duty to other employees, he cannot thereby escape liability for its nonperformance. Cadden v. American Steel Barge Co. (1894) 88 Wis. 409, 60 N. W. 800.

Similarly the courts have spoken of an "obligation not satisfied by devolving it upon a subordinate." Baird v. Relly (1899) 35 C. C. A. 78, 63 U. S. App. 157, 92 Fed. 884.

Of "duties to those serving him which he cannot devest himself of by any delegation to others." Indiana Car Co. v. Parker (1885) 100 Ind. 181, quoting from an essay by Judge Cooley in 2 Southern Law Review, N. S. 114 (p. 123).

Of "a duty which the master cannot rid himself of by casting it upon an agent, officer, or servant employed by him." Indiana Car Co. v. Parker (1885) 100 Ind. 181.

In another group of statements the language takes the shape of a declaration that co-service will not defeat the action, where the delinquent was discharging one of the personal duties of the master.

If an employee sustains an injury through the negligence of a coemployee, while such coemployee is performing the duties of the master, the master cannot defeat his recovery on the ground that they are fellow servants. Wilson v. Charleston & S. R. Co. (1896) 51 S. C. 79, 28 S. E. 81.

The negligence of a fellow servant or coemployee, acting as such, will not authorize a re-life was at stake if the material was defective. So far as the record discloses, no such inspection was had. The plank in question had a curl in the grain of the wood at the point where it broke, rendering it wholly unfit to support the weight placed upon it. Mr. Modjeski, a witness for the plaintiff in error, and a consulting engineer of considerable experience, states, with reference to the defective plank, a portion of which was produced as an exhibit: "The curl would very much diminish the strain the board would bear. It is curled on both edges. It looks as though the fiber was discontinued entirely." He further asserted that ordinarily the defect or curl would probably pass unnoticed; that he did not think a foreman in constructing the false work for the bridge would notice the defect; that there was a break in the plank which could be seen by close observation; that the defect might be observed by close inspection; that "I think that a man whose business it was to construct scaffolding upon which the lives of men depended, and whose duty it was to see that he got sound lumber, would see the curl of the lumber with the naked eye." The engineer of the bridge company testified that a man of ordinary care would very likely not have observed the defect, although "it is a question hard to answer, unless you have it all here" (referring to the fact that but part of the broken plank had been produced); that planks sometimes have such defects that cannot be observed except upon careful inspection. If the duty of inspection was delegated to the foreman in charge of the work, it was not performed. He instructed common laborers to select the plank, and to pick out the best. Such selection, however, covery in any case, although the fellow servant or coemployee may be a superior officer, an agent or a foreman; but, if the superior agent is charged with the performance of the master's duty, then, in so far as that duty is concerned, his acts and his negligence are the acts and the negligence of the master, and not simply those of a coemployee or fellow servant. Krueger v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. (1887) 111 Ind. 52, 11 N. E. 957. Compare Stucke v. Orleans R. Co. (1898) 50 La. Ann. 188, 28 So. 342.

The elementary conception underlying this form of statement is observable in the declaration that a servant does not assume the risks of negligent acts of this class on the part of the injured servant. Monmouth Mtn. & Mfg. Co. v. Erling (1894) 148 Ill. 521, 86 N. E. 117, Affirming (1892) 45 Ill. App. 411.

Commenting upon the last two of these alternative modes of statement in Rogers v. Ludlow Mfg. Co. (1887) 144 Mass. 201, 59 Am. Rep. 68, 11 N. E. 77, the court said: "As a corporation must act by natural persons, and as all large corporations carry on their business by means of servants of different grades, it is manifest that, if it is held that these are all fellow servants, and that the corporation can delegate the whole duty of hiring and superintending its servants, and of providing its machinery and of keeping it in repair, to one or more principal servants, such as superintendents or managers, the corporation may escape all responsibility for injuries caused by defective machinery, except in the few cases where it can be shown that these principal servants were incompetent, or that the directors of the corporation, or its principal officers, knew that the subordinate servants were incompetent, or that the machinery used was defective. To avoid this result, some courts have held that superintendents or managers are not fellow servants with the men employed to work under them, or that servants employed in one department of the business are not fellow servants with those employed in another. Other courts have held that they are all fellow servants, but that the master cannot avoid his obligation to see to it that reasonable care shall be exercised in procuring suitable machinery, in keeping it in repair, and in hiring and retaining competent servants, by employing a servant to do these things for him; and that, if he does employ a servant for this purpose, and the servant does not use due care, the master is responsible."

c. Subsidiary consequences deduced from the general principle.

From the principle that the master's liability is a peremptory inference of law, when the evidence is such that the master is responsible."

dence shows that the injury was caused by a violation of one of his nondelegable duties, several consequences follow:

If a master has no representative to discharge the nondelegable duties which he does not undertake to discharge in person, he is no less culpable than where the representative actually appointed for that purpose performs his functions negligently. Wilson v. Willimantic Linen Co. (1888) 50 Conn. 433, 47 Am. Rep. 653; Prescott v. J. Ottman Lithographing Co. (1897) 20 App. Div. 397, 46 N. Y. Supp. 812.

The master is none the less responsible because he did not know that his agent was habitually careless and unfit for his position. Whaley v. Bartlett (1894) 42 S. C. 454, 20 S. E. 745.

The mere fact that a vice principal had given orders which, if they had been executed, would have averted the catastrophe from which injury resulted, will not discharge his employer from liability. Empty orders will not suffice. Matise v. Consumers' Ice Mfg. Co. (1894) 46 La. Ann. 1535, 16 So. 400.

"All the cases," said the court in Wilson v. Willimantic Linen Co. (1888) 50 Conn. 433, 47 Am. Rep. 653 (appliance left incomplete), "hold that it is not enough for the master to order safe machinery to be constructed, but he must exercise reasonable care to see that the machinery is in fact safe after the order has been executed. It would be an easy matter for a master to escape liability if an order to construct safe machinery would be sufficient. That would be equivalent to exculpating him entirely from all liability in this regard."

Compare also Flike v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1878) 58 N. Y. 549, 13 Am. Rep. 545, where a brakeman, who had been hired to fill a vacancy, did not arrive, and the train was sent out with an insufficient number of hands. See III. 1, infra; Anderson v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1895) 107 Mich. 591, 65 N. W. 585 (assistant road-master sent section foreman to repair defective track, but did not see that his orders had been carried out properly); Galasso v. National S. S. Co. (1893) 27 App. Div. 169, 50 N. Y. Supp. 417, Rehearing denied in 51 N. Y. Supp. 136; Fuller v. Jewett (1880) 80 N. Y. 46, 38 Am. Rep. 575, Affirming s. c. sub nom. Stevenson v. Jewett (1878) 16 Hun, 210 (here it was expressly said by the court of appeals that the superintendent of repairs was not negligent, as he had given proper orders, and the immediate cause of the injury was the failure of the mechanics to do their work properly); McNamara v. Brooklyn City R. Co. (1895) 11 Misc. 667, 32 N. Y. Supp. 913; Martel v. Ross (1899) Rap. Jud. Quebec, 16 C. S. 118.

The fact that the delinquent was not the sole is not the inspection which duty to the servant required. The common laborer might form some judgment between two sticks of timber, and select the better one as they appeared to his uninformed and inexperienced mind; but he could not discover that which required for its ascertainment technical knowledge of woods and the ripened judgment of an expert. There is no evidence of inspection by principal or by vice principal; and, failing therein, the master is chargeable with knowledge of such defects as would have been ascertained by proper inspection by a competent person. The evidence produced by the master renders it probable that proper inspection would have discovered the defect. It was a question to be submitted to the jury whether the duty of inspection and the duty to furnish suitable material had been performed. The request to direct a verdict was therefore properly overruled.

The plaintiff in error preferred three requests to charge the jury, which are substantially to the effect that, if the bridge company had furnished an abundance of suitable material and appliances from which the foreman and other workmen engaged in the construction of the bridge could select such as was needed for the several parts of the temporary structure, then the defendant had performed its duty, and is not liable for any mistake in judgment by the foreman or other servants in the selection of suitable material out of the mass provided for use, although the plank in question was defective. There is one objection common to the three requests which renders them improper. Each of them excludes the question of the duty of the de-person to whom the performance of a nondelegable duty was intrusted as respects the plaintiff will not avail the master. Cole Bros. v. Wood (1894) 11 Ind. App. 37, 36 N. E. 1074 (the court remarked that the master "cannot shield himself from liability by dividing his duties and laying them on various subordinates").

The foreman of the shop of a railway company is no more a fellow servant of a watchman injured by the explosion of a defective boiler than is the master mechanic who has general supervision of the repairs. "Each within his sphere is the agent of the company." St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Harper (1884) 44 Ark. 524.

Similarly, in Brabbits v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1875) 38 Wis. 289, the contention was rejected that the defendant, although it might have been held liable if the nonrepair of the defective engine which caused the injury had been due to the negligence of its master mechanic, could not be required to answer for similar negligence on the part of the shop foreman. "Each in his sphere," said the court, "was the agent of the defendant, charged with the performance of certain duties which the latter owed to the public and to its servants, and, on principle, it seems quite immaterial that one of them was subordinate to the other, or that he operated in a narrower field. The relations between them were not unlike those usually existing between the master mechanic and general manager or superintendent, or between the latter and the board of directors. The functions of a railway company must be performed by numerous servants or employees, and among these there must necessarily be a gradation of authority, arranged with reference to the business of the company. Where two of these are charged with the same duty, no good reason is perceived why the company should be held liable for the failure of one to perform such duty, and not for the failure of the other. In this case the master mechanic and foreman were each charged with the duty of causing all defective engines to be repaired; and the failure of either to do so, after notice that an engine is out of repair and unsafe, is negligence. On what principle can it be successfully maintained that the failure of the master mechanic to do so is to be imputed to the defendant as negligence, while the same failure by the foreman is his own negligence, and not that of the defendant? I confess my inability to answer the question. . . .

It would be monstrous to allow the defendant to relieve itself from all liability for a breach of that duty by simply charging one of its inferior officers or servants with its performance. We hold, therefore, that the instruction was correct,—that notice to the foreman was notice to the defendant; that the negligence of the foreman was the negligence of the defendant; and that the latter is liable to the plaintiff for the injuries received by him because of such negligence."

The nondischarge of a personal duty is not excused by proof that the master enunciated a rule requiring employees to make a personal examination of appliances before trusting them. Bailey v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. (1893) 139 N. Y. 302, 34 N. E. 918; Bookrum v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. (1900; Tex. Civ. App.) 57 S. W. 919.

A custom to perform a personal duty through the agency of fellow servants is equally ineffectual to shield the master, if it is neglected. Donnelly v. Booth Bros. & H. I. Granite Co. (1897) 90 Me. 110, 37 Atl. 874.

In Boelter v. Ross Lumber Co. (1899) 103 Wis. 324, 79 N. W. 243, a servant was held not to be precluded from recovering for an injury sustained through the giving way of a wheel of the loaded wagon on which he was riding, due to the negligence of a fellow servant who failed to observe a custom that the teamsters should look after their own wagons.

See, however, VII. infra.

As to the effect of delegating personal duties to an independent contractor, see II. h, infra.

d. Rationale of the doctrine of nondelegable duties.

The establishment of the above doctrine has undoubtedly been brought about by a recognition of the fact that, unless the master's liability for the acts of a vice principal were admitted, the rule that dangers caused by the master's negligence are not among those assumed by the servant would be rendered nugatory.

In Snow v. Housatonic R. Co. (1864) 8 Allen, 441, 85 Am. Dec. 720, it was urged by the counsel for the defendant that the omission to repair the defect which occasioned the injury was the result of the negligence of the person whose duty it was to see that certain planks across the highway were kept in a safe and proper condition, and that the accident was therefore caused by the carelessness of a fellow servant. The answer of the court to this contention was as follows: "This argument leaves out of sight the real ground on which the liability of the defendant rests. If the argument is well founded, then it would follow that, as a corporation can act only by agents or servants, it would escape all responsibility for every species of injury caused by defective machinery and apparatus, or badly constructed tracks, or insufficient bridges, and other similar causes. So, an individual could avail himself of a similar immunity, if he con-fendant in a work of this character to have proper inspection of the lumber furnished. It is not sufficient discharge of the master's duty that sufficient good material should be mingled with bad material in a common mass. As we have pointed out, the duty of inspection could not be put aside or delegated for performance to ignorant and inexperienced men. If the defect were obvious, the master failed in duty in permitting the use of the defective plank. If proper inspection would have disclosed the defect, although it was not apparent to the uneducated eye, there is imputed to the master knowledge of that which a proper inspection would have furnished. If the defect were latent, and not discoverable upon proper inspection, the master would not be responsible, for his failure to inspect worked no harm. The requests to charge wholly ignored this duty of the master, and their rejection is therefore unavailing.

In submitting to the jury the question whether the defect was such as to charge the master with notice of it, and referring to the fact that only a part of the defective plank which was broken was exhibited, and to the testimony of expert witnesses that had examined the part of the plank in evidence, the court charged the jury that they had a right, from all the circumstances in the case, and from their inspection of the piece exhibited, to determine what, in all probability, the other side or end of the plank would show if produced; that the jurymen had a right to use their experience of lumber of this kind, and supply, as far as that experience and their good judgment went, the missing portion of the plank; that they were not restricted to the testimony of ducted his business exclusively by agents or servants. But the rule of law does not lead to any such absurd result. The liability of the master or employer in such cases is founded, as has been already said, on the implied obligation of his contract with those whom he employs in his service. This requires him to use due care in supplying and maintaining suitable instrumentalities for the performance of the work or duty which he requires of them, and renders him liable for damages occasioned by a neglect or omission to fulfil this obligation, whether it arises from his own want of care or that of his agents to whom he intrusts the duty. But it does not extend so far as to require of him that he should be responsible for the negligence of his servants, if of competent skill and experience, in using or managing the means and appliances placed in their hands in the course of their employment, if they are neither defective nor insufficient."

In Gilman v. Eastern R. Co. (1866) 18 Allen, 433, 90 Am. Dec. 210, after laying down the rule that the duty to have suitable instruments, whether persons or things, is nondelegable, the court proceeded: "To hold otherwise would be to exempt a master who selected all his machinery and servants through agents or superintendents, from all liability whatever to their fellow servants, although he had been grossly negligent in the selection or keeping of proper persons and means for conducting his business. In the case of a corporation the president and directors, at least, cannot be deemed mere servants, but must be considered as representing the corporation itself."

If the master suffers machinery, from wear and tear or otherwise, to become so bad that the hazard is greatly increased, this increased hazard is not one of the negligent acts of the fellow workmen, for such acts are merely part of the ordinary risks incident to the employment. The increased hazard thus produced is the act of the master, and he thus enhances the risks which the servant agreed to take. He cannot thus shift his responsibility by urging that the workman whom he employed was negligent. To hold that the master could do so would be to hold that he was under no obligation in respect to appliances or machinery. Bridges v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (1879) 6 Mo. App. 392.

It appears that part of the administrative functions of the corporation were confided to subagents and employees. Such practice may be, and probably is, necessary in the control and government of so large a corporation as a railroad usually is. But the performance of such delegated power by the subagent or employees is the act of the corporation, and the corporation is responsible for its faithful and prudent performance to the same extent as if the service were performed by the highest officer of the corporation. Tyson v. South & North Ala. R. Co. (1878) 61 Ala. 554, 32 Am. Rep. 8.

In Brown v. Gilchrist (1890) 80 Mich. 56, 45 N. W. 82, counsel went so far as to argue that, because the delinquent employee had absolute control and direction in and about the business, the defendants could not be held responsible, and urged that "there is absolutely no ground . . . for any claim that either of the defendants was present or superintending or directing in person the erection of this scaffold, or the selection of the materials of which it was composed." The comment of the court was as follows: "That is, because the defendants had delegated the authority to Mr. Reed to select proper materials, and to direct, control, and superintend the erection, they should escape liability. If this were the rule, then the more they remained away from their business,—the greater power and authority they gave a foreman or manager to select material, employ men to build a safe and proper scaffold, upon which other servants, who had no knowledge of the manner of its construction, were to be invited to work,—the less the liability."

See also Union P. R. Co. v. Erickson (1894) 41 Neb. 1, 29 L. R. A. 137, 59 N. W. 347; and the passages quoted infra, from the opinion in Indiana Car Co. v. Parker (1885) 100 Ind. 181.

But there is some discrepancy in the explanations of its logical basis which are found in the books. The most satisfactory standpoint seems to be obtained by considering it to be an application of the general principle of jurisprudence, that anyone upon whom a duty of an absolute quality is imposed must, at all events, see that it is adequately discharged, whether he undertakes its performance in person, or employs a deputy for that purpose. See 1 Beven, Neg. pp. 493 et seq.; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 14, 176.

That is to say, the care which a master is bound to use he can exercise through another only at his own risk. Van Steenburgh v. Thornton (1895) 58 N. J. L. 160, 33 Atl. 880.

The duty to exercise reasonable care to see that the place furnished for a servant to work in is reasonably safe is a positive obligation towards the servant; and the master is liable for any failure to discharge that duty, whether he undertakes that performance personally or through another servant. Hess v. Rosenthal (1896) 160 Ill. 621, 43 N. E. 743.

Compare also the statement that the fact that the insecure condition of a railroad track is remotely due to the negligence of some servant who failed to report its condition and put it witnesses; that they might use their own intelligence, and their own experience with lumber, and the knowledge which they brought with them into the jury room; and that it was their duty to use that information as much as the information they got from the witnesses. The question then being considered was whether the defect was obvious, and whether proper inspection of the plank would have disclosed the defect. Experts in woods had testified upon the subject, and there was possibly some conflict in their evidence, although, as we read their testimony, there was not much dispute that a proper inspection by an expert competent to judge of the sustaining strength and the character of woods would have discovered the defect; but, assuming the conflict, we think it competent for a jury, in judging of the opinions of experts, to bring to the question the application of their own knowledge and experience. The experts testified to their opinions. The force of such opinion is to be determined by the jury, and they might properly bring to bear, in considering the value which they should place upon the opinions expressed, their own good sense, judgment, and experience.

In Head v. Hargrave, 105 U. S. 45, 26 L. ed. 1028, where witnesses had testified to the value of professional services, the court, by Mr. Justice Field, said: "To direct them [the jury] to find the value of the services from the testimony of the experts alone was to say to them that the issue should be determined by the opinions of the attorneys, and not by the exercise of their own judgment of the facts on which those opinions were given. The evidence of experts as to the value of professional services does not differ in repair will not excuse the company from liability. O'Donnell v. Allegheny Valley R. Co. (1889) 59 Pa. 289, 98 Am. Dec. 336 (the word "remotely" seems, however, to be used with some want of accuracy here. If the negligence of the servant is "remote" in the ordinary sense in which that term is used in discussions as to causation, it would clearly not be an element in the case at all, instead of being one which merely did not prevent liability from attaching).

It is manifest that, if the decisive elements are the nonperformance of an obligation and the legal significance of the resulting conditions, as betokening care or the absence of care, the fact that those conditions may have been immediately due to the act of a human agent becomes an element in the investigation as entirely neutral and unimportant as if the master had brought them about by his own management of an inorganic instrumentality or of one of the lower animals. This point of view is distinctly apparent in the statement that, where the cause of action relied on is an alleged failure of the defendant to use reasonable care to provide safe materials for the plaintiff's work, the question to be decided is whether the defendant failed in that specific duty, and it is of no consequence how the materials furnished became dangerous, whether by the act of a fellow servant or otherwise. Neveu v. Sears (1892) 155 Mass. 803, 29 N. E. 472.

Some places of work and some kinds of machinery are more dangerous than others, but that is something which inheres in the thing itself, which is a matter of necessity, and cannot be obviated. But within such limits the master who provides the place, the tools, and the machinery owes a positive duty to his employee in respect thereto. That positive duty does not go to the extent of a guarantee of safety, but it does require that reasonable precautions be taken to secure safety, and it matters not to the employee by whom that safety is secured, or the reasonable precautions therefor taken. He has a right to look to the master for the discharge of that duty, and if the master, instead of discharging it himself, sees fit to have it attended to by others, that does not change the measure of obligation to the employee, or the latter's right to insist that reasonable precaution shall be taken to secure safety in these respects. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh (1893) 149 U. S. 368, 387, 37 L. ed. 772, 781, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 814.

The applicability of this elementary conception, however, is not always brought out as clearly as might be desired in the passage in which judges have undertaken to state the grounds of the master's liability. Thus, it is sometimes said that a servant who is intrusted with the discharge of one of the so-called non-delegable or nonassignable duties is an agent, not a servant, such agency being regarded as a deduction from the fact that the rule which imputes to servants an acceptance of the risks of a fellow servant's negligence ceases, under the supposed circumstances, to be operative because the reasons upon which its existence depends are not properly applicable. But the extract quoted below shows that the consideration by which the implication usually indulged as to such an acceptance of the risks is deemed to be overridden is really the absolute quality of the duties discharged by the agent.

In Indiana Car Co. v. Parker (1885) 100 Ind. 181, the court said: "where the duty is one owing by the master, and he intrusts its performance to an agent, the agent's negligence is that of the master. As the master is charged with the imperative duty of providing safe and suitable appliances, this duty he must perform, and if he intrusts it to an agent, and the agent performs it in his place, the agent's act is that of the master. In authorising an agent to perform such an act, the principal is, in legal contemplation, himself acting when the agent acts, for he who acts by an agent acts by himself. This principle does not conflict with any of the general rules we have stated, for the agent assumes, by authority, the master's place, and does what the law commands the master to do. He is, for the occasion and in the eyes of the law, the master. If it be true that the agent's act is the master's act, then it must be true that the negligence involved in the act is that of the master himself. The rule which absolves the master from liability for the negligence of the fellow servant has no application whatever where the agent stands in the master's place. The reason of the rule fails, and where the reason fails, so does the rule itself. The reasons which support the rule are that servants take the risks of the employment upon which they enter, and that public policy requires that fellow servants should each be an observer of the conduct of the other. Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp. (1842) 4 Met. 49, 38 Am. Dec. 339. The first of these reasons completely fails when it is brought to mind that the servant does not assume the risk arising from unsafe and unsuitable machinery and appliances. The second as surely and completely fails when we affirm, as under all the authorities affirm we must, that the duty to provide safe appliances rests upon the master, and not on any servant, for, surely, servants are not bound to be observers of the master's conduct. It is, therefore, not at all fer in principle from such evidence as to the value of labor in other departments of business, or as to the value of property. So far from laying aside their own general knowledge and ideas, the jury should have applied that knowledge and those ideas to the matters of fact in evidence in determining the weight to be given to the opinions expressed, and it was only in that way that they could arrive at a just conclusion."

In The Conqueror, 168 U. S. 110, 41 L. ed. 937, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510, damages were claimed for the detention of a boat, and it was urged that the amount of the damage should be determined by the testimony given as to the value of the use of the boat. The court, by Mr. Justice Brown, observed: "While there are doubtless authorities holding that a jury . . . has no right arbitrarily to ignore or discredit the testimony of unimpeached witnesses so far as they testify to facts, . . . no such obligation attaches to witnesses who testify merely to their opinion; and the jury may deal with it as they please, giving it credence or not, as their own experience or general knowledge of the subject may dictate. . . . The ultimate weight to be given to the testimony of experts is a question to be determined by the jury, and there is no rule of law which requires them to surrender their judgment, or to give a controlling influence to the opinions of scientific witnesses."

In the 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th paragraphs of the charge, to which exceptions were taken, the court below dealt with the question of the character which the foreman assumed with respect to the selection of this plank, and whether selection of it by him would be selection by the company, and his difficult to clearly discriminate and broadly mark the difference between a case where it is the master's duty, as master, that is neglected, and a case where it is the fellow servant's duty, as servant, that is negligently performed. A servant has a right, himself exercising ordinary care, to rely upon his master's care and diligence. He is not bound to watch his master as he is his fellow servant. The rights are reciprocal, the master has his duty as the servant has his. When the master's duty is negligently done, he it is who is guilty of a breach of duty although he acted through the medium of an agent. If the master were permitted to escape his duty by shifting it to an agent, the practical result would be his entire absolution from the duty which the law imposes. The law will not permit this result, for it will not permit a duty to be evaded, but will require performance by the person upon whom it has fixed it."

Another explanation treats the master's liability as the result of the fact that the employees who discharge nondelegable duties are not in the same department as the employees who use the various instrumentalities which are the subject-matter of those duties.

The agents who are charged with the duty of supplying safe machinery are not, in the true sense of the rule relied on, to be regarded as fellow servants of those who are engaged in operating it. They are charged with the master's duty to his servant. They are employed in distinct and independent departments of service, and there is no difficulty in distinguishing them, even when the same person renders service by turn in each, as the convenience of the employer may require. Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1872) 110 Mass. 240, 14 Am. Rep. 598. Quoted with approval in Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. (1879) 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. ed. 612.

All those by whom a corporation performs its work are its servants, and thus fellow servants each with the other. But the relation in which those who together manage the train for the purpose of performing transportation stand each to the other is quite different from that which they bear to those who perform the work of its construction and repair; and they have a right to expect the suitable instrumentalities and appliances which it is the duty of the master to furnish. Elmer v. Locke (1883) 135 Mass. 575.

That doctrine (the nonliability of the master for the negligence of a fellow servant) was never applied unless the one injured and the one at fault were engaged in the same general employment. Whatever conflict has arisen in cases has been as to what should be considered the same general employment. The rule adopted by the Federal courts, and by most of the states, and which seems to us most in consonance with reason and humanity, is that those employed by the master to provide or to keep in repair the place, or to supply the machinery and tools, for labor, are engaged in a different employment from those who are to use the place or appliances when provided, and they are not therefore, as to each other, fellow servants. In such case the safety of the place where the work is to be done represents the master in such a sense that the latter is liable for his negligence. Roux v. Blodgett & D. Lumber Co. (1893) 94 Mich. 607, 616, 54 N. W. 492.

Those employed by the master to provide or to keep in repair the place, or to supply the machinery and tools, for labor, are engaged in a different employment from those who are to use the place or appliances when provided, and they are not therefore, as to each other, fellow servants. In such case the one whose duty it is to provide and look after the safety of the place where the work is to be done represents the master in such a sense that the latter is liable for his negligence. Sadowski v. Michigan Car Co. (1890) 84 Mich. 100, 47 N. E. 598.

To provide machinery, and keep it in repair, and to use it for the purpose intended, are very distinct. They are not employments in the same common service leading to the same common results. The one may be said to begin where the other ends. Shanney v. Androscoggin Mills (1876) 66 Me. 420.

In St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Weaver (1886) 35 Kan. 412, 57 Am. Rep. 176, 11 Pac. 408, the roadmaster, the division roadmaster, and the section foreman and his assistants were in one line of duty, while the trainmen were in another and a different line of duty, and each set within its own line of employment represented the master as to the other set; and the members of one set were not the mere fellow servants with the members of the other set. The principal ground upon which the doctrine has been established that the master is not liable for any negligence that might take place as between mere fellow servants is, that such fellow servants work together in the same line of employment, are intimately acquainted with each other, and, knowing each other better than the master could possibly know any one of them, they take all risks of negligence on the part of their fellow servants; that if any servant chooses to work with a known incompetent or negligent fellow servant, without informing the master, he himself should take all the risks and consequences of his fellow servant's negligence and incapacity, the master being required only to use rea-negligence in the selection the negligence of the company; or whether he stood in the light of a fellow servant, and therefore the master would not be responsible for his act. The court charged that under the circumstances the foreman stood in the stead of the company, and his act in that respect was the act of the company; "that, if it were within his opportunity to prevent the use of this plank, and from his neglect this plank went into the structure of the false work, then that negligence is imputable to the company, the same as if the company were itself present, and had taken the plank he actually took, and placed it in the structure." The court further charged that, if the jury were satisfied "that the plank in question was defective, and that the defect was obvious, and that it being placed there in this false work was negligence of the foreman, and that the foreman had an opportunity or had knowledge of its having been placed there, and that the foreman had all the powers which I have named, and which are not disputed, the company would be responsible for his neglect." It may not be denied that in the argumentative part of the charge leading up to the instruction stated there are some things stated of doubtful correctness, and, if given in a charge to a jury, when the question of principal or vice principal hung in the balance, we should hesitate to sustain them. It must be remembered, however, that there is here total failure of evidence that the master had procured this lumber to be inspected; that by authority of the master the lumber was purchased by, and used under the direction of, this foreman in this work. The duty of inspection would seem from the evidence to have been delegated to the foreman. There is no evidence that that duty was performed by him. In respect thereof he stood for the master, and was vice principal, and was not sonable and ordinary care and diligence in the original employment and the subsequent retention of only such servants as are competent and habitually careful. Dow v. Kansas P. R. Co. (1871) 8 Kan. 642, 646. But where employees work in different lines of employment, one having no means of knowing anything about the business or qualifications of the other, and being wholly unacquainted with the other, they cannot be said to be fellow servants within the meaning of the foregoing rule; and this state of things fairly represents the condition of a railroad section foreman and an engineer on a freight train, and the relation existing between them. Therefore, where a railroad company delegates, directly or indirectly, to a section boss or section foreman the duty of keeping a certain section of the railroad in proper condition and repair, and to warn trainmen in case of danger, and the section boss fails to perform his duty in these respects, and a trainman is injured by reason of such negligence, the railroad is responsible.

There is a certain incongruity in holding that the duty to exercise reasonable care in providing reasonably safe appliances and machinery is a personal one, which cannot be delegated, and at the same time holding that if the failure to exercise such reasonable care was the neglect of a fellow servant of the party injured, then the master is not liable; and it seems more correct to say that agents who are charged with the duty of supplying machinery and appliances are not, when so doing, in the true sense, to be regarded as fellow servants of those who are engaged in the use of the same. Edward Hines Lumber Co. v. Ligas (1898) 172 Ill. 315, 50 N. E. 225, commenting on Fraser v. Red River Lumber Co. (1891) 45 Minn. 235, 47 N. W. 785.

In Cadden v. American Steel Barge Co. (1894) 88 Wis. 409, 60 N. W. 800, the court, after declaring that the defendant must answer for the negligence of the workmen employed to build a scaffold, for the reason that the duty they were performing was nondelegable, continued thus: "The scaffold builders were not in the true sense of the rule relied on fellow servants with the plaintiff, who was using the scaffold, but were charged with the duty of the master to the servant, and were therefore engaged in a distinct and independent department."

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Seeley (1894) 54 Kan. 21, 37 Pac. 104, an employee intrusted with the duty of inspecting cars was declared not to be in the same branch of the service as a brakeman, though the rest of the argument was 54 L. R. A.

In Gray v. Brassey (1852) 15 Sc. Sess. Cas. 2d series, 135, one of the cases approved is Bartonsbill Coal Co. v. Beld (1858) 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 266, 4 Jur. N. S. 767. The complaint was held good for the reason that it showed the injury to have been received owing to the negligence of a servant in another department with which the plaintiff had no concern, viz., that of furnishing machinery.

To pronounce such a standpoint to be erroneous would scarcely be justifiable in view of the body of authorities by whom it has been adopted. But it is certainly open to some objection. But the conception of a difference of department is also suggestive of that class of cases in which the delinquent and injured servants were engaged in spheres of work so disconnected that neither can be deemed to have assumed the risks of the other's negligence. See note to Sofeld v. Guggenheim Smelting Co. (1900; N. J. L.) 50 L. R. A. 439-442.

Merely for the purpose of securing greater verbal precision, therefore, it seems desirable that the conception should be reserved for the settlement of these cases alone. Moreover, if the phrase is used to describe these two distinct kinds of relations between delinquent and injured servants, we are confronted by the logical difficulty that the degree of disconnection which will prevent this implication may, it is manifest, exist no less between two servants who are using instrumentalities than between one servant belonging to this category and another who is discharging nondelegable duties with respect to those instrumentalities. This objection is not obviated by the fact that sometimes those relations may be such that it may be equally possible and proper to refer the master's liability, either to the idea of a difference of department, as that phrase is commonly understood, or to the idea of the nondelegability of the duty omitted.

In Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Maroney (1897) 170 Ill. 520, 48 N. E. 953, affirming (1896) 67 Ill. App. 618, the appellate court decided in the plaintiff's favor on the ground that the carpenters who built a scaffold were not associated with the plaintiff, a mason, who used it; while the supreme court sustained the action on the ground that the carpenters were discharging a non-delegable duty.

In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Jackson (1870) 55 Ill. 492, 8 Am. Rep. 661, the court upheld a verdict for the plaintiff, using the following language: "This car was placed upon the road coservant with those employed upon the structure. The charge to which objection is taken makes the question of liability to depend upon the question whether the defect was obvious, and the defective plank placed in the false work through the negligence of the foreman. If any just exception can be taken to this charge, it is that it was too favorable to the bridge company. It was not bound only in the event that the defect was obvious. It was chargeable with such knowledge as a proper inspection would have given. The defect may not have been obvious to the untrained eye and the unskilled laborer, or to the foreman; but to one experienced in woodcraft, as the evidence shows, the defect might have been discovered, and, if discoverable, the master is chargeable with the knowledge which inspection would have given.

Certain evidence was objected to upon the

by someone superior to appellee in authority, and he was acting under such authority. The jury might reasonably infer that those placing it on the road knew its condition. He had no choice but to obey orders, and was compelled by those above him in authority to ascend the car and again descend and uncouple the car from the engine when required. He was not and could not be, responsible for the defect. Nor should he be held liable for the defective car, as he neither furnished it nor placed it upon the track. Nor should he be held responsible for the acts of those who did, as fellow servants, as the fault was not that of such a servant engaged in the same department of the common business. It was the act of a superior in another department."

In Moon v. Richmond & A. R. Co. (1884) 78 Va. 745, 49 Am. Rep. 401, a section foreman was held not to be a fellow servant of trainmen on the double ground that he was in a different department, and that he was responsible for the proper discharge of the nonassignable duty of keeping the track in safe condition.

e. Master sometimes liable both on account of the character of the negligent act and the official position of the negligent servant.

The performance of the nondelegable duties is not infrequently intrusted to some employee who controls a larger or smaller number of subordinates. It follows, therefore, that if such an employee causes injury to one of his subordinates, by delinquency in respect to one of those duties, and the nature and extent of the control exercised by him are such as to constitute him a vice principal, the master's liability may be inferred indifferently from their official position, or from the character of the negligent act. This situation may present itself both in jurisdictions where the mere exercise of control is deemed to confer representative capacity (see, for example, the following decisions in favor of servants injured by the negligence of their foreman in the matters indicated by the memoranda appended to the citations: Bowen v. Chicago, B. & K. C. R. Co. [1888] 95 Mo. 268, 8 S. W. 230; [bridge not repaired]; Union P. R. Co. v. Fray [1890] 43 Kan. 750, 23 Pac. 1039 [derrick not repaired]; Browning v. Wabash Western R. Co. [1893] 124 Mo. 55, 24 S. W. 731, Affirmed [1894] in 27 S. W. 644 [brakestaffs removed from freight cars]; Taylor v. Missouri P. R. Co. [1891: Mo.] 16 S. W. 206 [defective coupling furnished]; Banks v. Wabash Western R. Co. [1890] 40 Mo. App. 458; Richmond Granite Co. v. Bailey [1896] 92 Va. 554, 24 S. E. 232 [rule 54 L. R. A.

ground that it was not cross-examination. It is largely a matter of discretion with the trial court to determine the extent to which a cross-examination will be permitted, and we are not disposed to interfere with that discretion where it is manifest—as we think it here is—that a just verdict has been rendered, and that the testimony objected to could not have improperly affected the result. The exception to that part of the charge bearing upon the testimony so adduced is too general, failing to indicate the ground of objection. Stewart v. Morris, 37 C. C. A. 562, 96 Fed. 703; Columbus Constr. Co. v. Crane Co. 40 C. C. A. 35, 98 Fed. 946, 41 C. C. A. 189, 101 Fed. 55; Adams v. Shirk, 43 C. C. A. 407, 104 Fed. 54.

We have considered the other objections urged, and do not find them of sufficient merit to warrant discussion of them.

The judgment is affirmed.

abrogated); and in jurisdictions where such capacity is admitted only in the case of agents managing an entire business or a distinct department thereof. See the cases cited in the note to O'Neil v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900; Minn.) 51 L. R. A. 566, 559, 572.

f. Doctrine of nondelegable duties applicable to artificial persons.

Although a categorical affirmation of such a point might seem scarcely necessary, there is specific authority for the doctrine that a corporation is no less responsible than a natural person for the proper performance of an employer's absolute duties, although it is impossible for it to discharge those duties otherwise than through agents. Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1872) 110 Mass. 240, 14 Am. Rep. 598; Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. (1879) 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. ed. 612; Corcoran v. Holbrook (1875) 59 N. Y. 517, 17 Am. Rep. 369.

Instructions are erroneous which declare that a corporation is not liable for the negligence of any of its officers except its board of directors. Krueger v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. (1887) 111 Ind. 51, 11 N. E. 957.

A limited company created under the provisions of the English companies act and similar statutes is also as much liable as an individual for its failure to perform any of the duties which a master owes to employees. Wright v. Dunlop (1893) 20 Sc. Seas. Cas. 4th series, 363.

Indeed, it may fairly be said that a more reasonable view of the situation which exists in cases where a corporation is concerned is that the impossibility of exercising personal control is a ground for holding such artificial bodies liable rather than for applying a less rigorous standard of responsibility. See Brann v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1890) 53 Iowa, 585, 36 Am. Rep. 243, 6 N. W. 5.

Manifestly if they could escape liability for the breach of an absolute duty on the plea that their agent was a fellow servant or coemployee of the party injured, they could never be held at all. See Moon v. Richmond & A. R. Co. (1884) 78 Va. 745, 49 Am. Rep. 401; Flike v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1873) 53 N. Y. 549, 13 Am. Rep. 545.

Compare also the cases cited in the preceding subdivision.

g. Servants of contractors, when precluded from availing themselves of the doctrine in actions against their masters.

A contract for work to be done may be so

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Maltbie, Deceased, Resp't.,
v.

(167 N. Y. 307.)

1. A servant employed in deepening a canal assumes the risk of the fall of standing trees, in complying with the request of his foreman to assist in extinguishing a fire spreading through swamp and underbrush towards property of the employer on the canal bank, the danger of which is as obvious to him as to any other person engaged in saving the property.
2. A foreman and a servant engaged in deepening a canal are fellow serv-worded that the principal has the right to prescribe the manner in which its various details are to be executed. If the contractor is thus required to act, according to the principal's directions, the workmen are deemed to be so far the servants of the principal that the contractor is released from the duty to furnish them with suitable materials. But there is no such exemption where the provisions of the contract are merely that the work shall be executed under the supervision of an officer of the government, who shall prescribe the order in which the materials are to be placed, that no material shall be placed in the works without his knowledge, that the contractor will remove from the work any person not acceptable to the agents of the government, and that all material, supervision, and labor furnished by him shall be subject to the approval of the engineer officer in charge. Callan v. Bull (1896) 113 Cal. 503, 45 Pac. 1017.

h. Delegation of personal duties to an independent contractor, effect of.

It is apparent that the rule discussed in the note to Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines (1898: Mich.) 41 L. R. A. p. 71,—that a master is not negligent in omitting to test appliances if he purchases them from a reputable dealer or manufacturer,—virtually creates an exception pro tanto to the operation of the doctrine of nondelegable duties; for although the rationale of the decisions there cited is the absence of negligence, the rule virtually amounts to an assertion that a master may, to some extent, evade responsibility for the nonperformance of one of those duties, viz., that of supplying proper instrumentalities, by procuring them from an independent contractor. Singularly enough, this aspect of the rule does not seem to have thus far attracted the attention of the courts.

As regards the cases involving the liability of a master for the default of an independent contractor in discharging a nondelegable duty, they are so conflicting as to render it impossible to formulate any definite doctrine upon the subject. In England the only decision directly in point seems to be one in which Denman, J., sitting alone, held that a servant could not recover where a staging which gave way under him had been put up by a competent contractor. Kiddle v. Lovett (1885) L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. 605, 34 Week. Rep. 518.

If such failure in duty be regarded as one of management, the doctrine laid down in Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, would obviously have freed 54 L. R. A.

ants in attempting to extinguish a fire spreading over adjacent land towards property of the master on the canal bank, so that the master is not liable for injuries to the servant from the negligence of the foreman in failing to warn him of the impending fall of burning trees.

the master from liability, even if the deputy had been another servant. See notes to O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900; Minn.) 51 L. R. A. 564.

But the learned judge seems to have intended to enunciate a general principle, and would, so far as appears, have rendered a similar decision if the point had been taken that the delinquency which led to the injury was one having reference to original construction or the furnishing of appliances. If this be really the scope of the decision it would seem to be incorrect upon any reasonable construction of the opinion of the law lords in the case just mentioned. See notes to O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900; Minn.) 51 L. R. A. 571, 572.

In Scotland the natural conception of a positive duty has been followed out to its logical conclusion in a case where it was laid down that, if the defect in an appliance (here a scaffold) could have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable care, a master is answerable for injuries caused by its unsafe condition, even though the master, not being properly skilled himself, may have intrusted the work of furnishing the appliance to a competent contractor. Macdonald v. Wylie (1898) 1 Sc. Sess. Cas. 5th series, 339.

In one of the circuit courts of appeals the doctrine has been laid down, without qualification, that a master is not relieved of a positive personal duty by letting work to a contractor. Toledo Brewing & Malting Co. v. Bosch (1900) 41 C. C. A. 482, 101 Fed. 530 (plaintiff was injured by the fall of a heavy beam due to the negligence of the contractor's servants in leaving it loose while repairs were being made).

In a Georgia case, in which no opinion is reported, the court has embodied its views in a syllabus which lays it down that a railroad company permitting another company to use a section of its main line to reach a terminal point is liable to one of its own employees for personal injuries from the negligence of the latter company in running its train over such section. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Passmore (1892) 90 Ga. 203, 15 S. E. 760, following Macon & A. R. Co. v. Mayes (1873) 49 Ga. 355, 15 Am. Rep. 678.

In Illinois it has been held that persons who, under a license from the master, put in new burners in a brick kiln for the purpose of testing their advantages, are in the position of vice principals so far as relates to making such apparatus suitable and safe for the employees, or giving notice of increased danger. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Laack (1892) 143 Ill. 242, 18 L. R. A. 215, 32 N. E. 285. One of the grounds on which the decision proceeded was that the

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William Nottingham, for appellants:

The plaintiff's intestate, involuntarily entering upon this hazardous work at the request of his foreman, Seeley, assumed all the risks incidental thereto, of which the falling of burning trees and limbs was plainly one of the most direct and obvious.

It is a matter of common knowledge that burning trees or timber are likely to fall, and that no one can state just when that will happen. The deceased is presumed to have been aware of all these facts and natural laws and their consequences. They were among the obvious perils which he assumed when he went upon this land to put out the fire.

And still more recently it has been held that an employee could recover for injuries due to defects in the appliances of a contractor.

In Missouri it has been declared that a master cannot relieve himself of the duty of exercising ordinary care to provide reasonably safe appliances for his servants, by the employment of superintendents or independent contractors to provide such appliances. Herdler v. Buck's Stove & Range Co. (1896) 186 Mo. 3, 37 S. W. 115; Burnes v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. (1895) 129 Mo. 41, 31 S. W. 347; Bartley v. Troilicht (1892) 49 Mo. App. 214 (elevator fell into disrepair), Citing Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert (1886) 116 U. S. 647, 29 L. ed. 758, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 590.

It was further held in the Bartley Case that the fact that an elevator was leased with a building will not absolve the lessee from liability for injuries to his elevator boy by its fall, caused by the lessee's failure to use reasonable care to keep it in repair.

Sackewitz v. American Biscuit Mfg. Co. (1899) 78 Mo. App. 144, holds that there is a sufficient correspondence between a petition alleging that, while the plaintiff was in defendant's employment, she was required to work in a place rendered unsafe by the negligent acts of men engaged in repairing the building, and proof that plaintiff was injured by the negligent acts of one who had entered into a contract with defendants to repair the building.

Under a statute giving a right of action against the owner, agent, or operator of a mine, for injury caused by failure to furnish props, the owner is liable, even though the mine is operated by another under a contract with the owner,—especially where such contract provides that the latter shall furnish timber for props. Leslie v. Rich Hill Coal Min. Co. (1892) 110 Mo. 31, 19 S. W. 308.

In New Jersey it has been held that a servant injured by an elevator which is in course of construction by an independent contractor on the master's premises cannot recover. Conway v. Furst (1895) 57 N. J. L. 645, 32 Atl. 380. But in such a case there is no delegation of a duty in the proper sense of the phrase, and the circumstances are controlled by the principle that the dangerous agencies were, for the time being, quite out of the control of the plaintiff's master.

In New York the doctrine established is that an employer is not liable to a servant for the condition of a structure erected by an independent contractor for the use of his servant. The question was very fully discussed in Devlin v. 54 L. R. A.

Smith (1881) 25 Hun, 206, Affirmed in (1882) 89 N. Y. 470, 42 Am. Rep. 311. There the defendant was employed to paint a building, and, not being able himself to build a scaffold, employed a skillful and competent person to build it. It was held that A was not liable for injuries received by one of his workmen through the giving way of the scaffold. The position taken in the lower court is shown by the following passage of the opinion delivered: "Whenever the employer has been held liable, not for his own negligence, but for the negligence of another person, it was upon the ground that the latter was charged with his duties. . . .

That is not the case where the employer, not having the requisite skill to do the work himself, intrusts the performance of it entirely to a competent and unexceptionable contractor. The employer cannot escape the responsibility of exercising due care by delegating that duty to an agent, but he can employ a competent and unexceptionable contractor to construct tools, machinery, etc., and such conduct would be the exercise of that care which the law requires. The employment of a contractor is not a delegation of the employer's duty. It is, when properly done, an exercise of the care, and a fulfillment of the duty which the law exacts. It would be unreasonable and unjust to hold an employer liable for the negligence of such a contractor so employed, for the employment of him would not be negligence, and the contractor's negligence could not be attributed to the employer, because no relation of agency would exist between them. Unless, therefore, the employer knew of the defect which caused the injury, or his ignorance thereof of itself indicated a breach of duty on his part, there would be nothing of which negligence could be predicated. . . .

Smith having used due care in procuring the scaffold, and having no knowledge nor any reason to apprehend that it was in any respect defective, he was justified in subjecting it to immediate use without inspection. It is true, an inspection might have disclosed the fact that the support which gave way was fastened with nails instead of ropes. But no reason has been shown why that fact should have admonished Smith that the scaffold was unsafe. Not being an expert, his inspection must have been merely that of a common observer. If the defect in the scaffold would have been apparent to him, the deceased was equally bound to take notice of it; one was as competent to determine whether the fastenings referred to were sufficient or not as the other." The argument of the court of appeals proceeds upon much the same lines: "Under the recent decisions in this state, it may be that if Smith had undertaken to erect the scaffold through agents, or workmen acting under his direction, he would have been liable for negligence on their part in doing the work, provided that in doing it they were not fellow servants of the party injured. But in this case he did not so undertake. Stevenson was not the agent or servant of Smith, but an independent contractor for whose acts or omissions Smith was not liable. Blake v. Ferris (1851) 5 N. Y. 48, 55 Am. Dec. 804. Smith received the scaffold from him as a completed work, and we do not think that it was negligence to rely upon its sufficiency and permit his employees to go upon it for the purpose of performing their work. Stevenson was, as appears from the evidence, much more competent than Smith to judge of its sufficiency. He had undertaken to construct a first-class scaffold, and had delivered it to Smith in performance of this contract, and we do not think that Smith is chargeable with negligence for accepting it without further examination. All that such an examination would have disclosed would have been that the upright was nailed to the ledger, and Smith, not being an expert, would have been justified in relying upon the judgment of Stevenson as to the propriety of that mode of fastening. The defect was not such as to admonish Smith of danger."

The method of putting out the fire, thus preventing damage and protecting the master's property, and the manner of avoiding at the same time the perils incidental to such service, were details of the work that belonged to the duties of the servant, and not to those which the master owed to him. Anything done or omitted by the foreman, therefore, relating to the peril to which the servant was exposed in extinguishing the fire, was the act or omission of a fellow servant, and not of the master.

To the same effect, see Wittenberg v. Friederich (1890) 8 App. Div. 433, 40 N. Y. Supp. 895, where a floor constructed by a sub-contractor in a building which a contractor was erecting gave way and injured one of the latter's servants.

These cases seem inconsistent with Wannamaker v. Rochester (1892) 44 N. Y. S. R. 45, 17 N. Y. Supp. 321, where a municipality was held liable for injuries caused by the caving in of a trench made by an independent contractor. But there is no discussion of the general question involved in such a situation.

It will be observed from the extracts given from the opinion of the court of appeals that, while recognizing the antagonism between this doctrine and that of the nondelegable quality of certain duties, it contents itself with declaring the master's nonliability, and gives no reasons for its opinion.

In Pennsylvania it has been laid down, arguendo, in a comparatively late case that, as the master owes to the servant the duty of providing a reasonably safe place in which to work, and reasonably safe appliances, he is not relieved from liability for an injury resulting to a servant from neglect of such duty by the fact that he delegated it to an agent or independent contractor. *Trainor v. But there is an earlier decision to the effect that if a mechanic is under a contract to construct stills of sufficient strength for a certain purpose, and the details are left to his own judgment and skill, the employer cannot be visited with the consequences of his failure. Ardesco Oil Co. v. Gilson (1870) 63 Pa. 146. The liability of the company was held to be for the jury, as there was evidence that the stills were made according to a plan directed by the president: but the court states the rule as to the result of employing a contractor in the most uncompromising terms. "It may be considered as now settled that, if a person employs others, not as servants, but as mechanics, or contractors in an independent business, and they are of good character, if there is no want of due care in choosing them he incurs no liability for injuries resulting to others from their negligence or want of skill. Painter v. Pittsburgh (1863) 46 Pa. 213. If I employ a well-known and reputable machinist to construct a steam engine, and it blows up from bad materials or unskilful work, I am not responsible for any injury which may result, whether to my own servant or to a third person."

The task of reconciling the conflicting views thus evidenced must be left to the distinguished court which is responsible for them. To the present writer the more recent expression of opinion appears to be unquestionably the correct one. It is worth observing that, as the doctrine of nondelegable duties had not yet been formulated with much distinctness at the time the earlier case was decided, it is extremely probable that the effect of such a conception as qualifying the rule with regard to independent contractors was not considered at all by the court. The opinion delivered gives no indication that this aspect of the relations of the parties was taken into account.

In Rhode Island a company was held responsible for the negligence of an independent contractor in so constructing a crane that the hauling chains were not properly insulated from the current of electricity which operated it. Moran v. Corliss Steam Engine Co. (1899) 21 R. I. 386, 45 L. R. A. 267, 43 Atl. 874 (the appliance became dangerous after being put into use).

Some language has been held by the supreme court of South Carolina which would seem to indicate that the master is not absolved from liability for conditions of the place created by work which is being done by a contractor. Conlin v. Charleston (1868) 15 Rich. L. 201. But the precise position of the learned judge who wrote the opinion is not very clearly defined.

In Texas it has been held that the duty of a railroad company to an employee to furnish

In the latter case, the contract for ballasting a railroad track provided that "the contractor would carry on and prosecute the work in such manner" as the engineer of the railroad company should direct, and the injury was caused by a defect in a derrick used by the contractor in performing such work.

In Virginia, on the general ground that the reconstruction of a railway bridge without the interruption of traffic is not an essentially hazardous undertaking, but may be effected with entire safety if ordinary care be used, a company has been held not liable for the negligence of a reputable contractor, employed to do the work. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Stevens (1899) 97 Va. 631, 46 L. R. A. 367, 34 S. E. 525 (train went through one of the spans, owing to the fact that the false work had been taken away too soon).

The court does not refer to any of the authorities opposed to its own conclusion, and contents itself with applying the general rule as to independent contractors, without noticing the possibility of an exception to that rule in the case of absolute duties.

Whichever of these views of the nature of the master's liability is taken, it is manifest that the general principles which determine the extent of the responsibility of an employer for the acts of an independent contractor involve the corollary that the owner of premises cannot dictate that his building be constructed of improper materials or upon an unsafe plan, and escape liability for injuries caused thereby because he made a contract with a third person to build it; nor can he, with knowledge of a weakness or defect threatening the strength of the building, set a man at work immediately under it, and shift all responsibility upon the builder. McIver v. Morgan (1892) 82 Wis. 289, 52 N. W. 174.

Similarly, since the physical conditions created by the negligence are the necessary result of the work contracted for, an employee of a street railway which is relaying its rails under a municipal permit may recover for injuries due to an obstruction in the track. North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Dudgeon (1900) 184 Ill. 477, 36 N. E. 796, Affirmed (1898) 83 Ill. App. 528, 54 L. R. A.

I. Same subject continued; opposing doctrines discussed.

The cases absolving the master from responsibility for the negligence of an independent contractor in this connection clearly seem to have been decided upon a false theory of the circumstances involved. It is a contradiction in terms to speak of an absolute duty as being susceptible of delegation. If it can be delegated in any particular instance, it ceases, ex hypothesi, to be absolute. That this is a necessary corollary of the theory that a duty is absolute has been fully recognized in many English and American cases, where the complainant was a stranger. Hole v. Sittingbourne & S. R. Co. (1861) 6 Hurlst. & N. 488, 30 L. J. Exch. N. S. 81, 8 L. T. N. S. 750, 9 Week. Rep. 274 (railway company held liable for the act of a contractor in obstructing the navigation of a river while building a bridge); Tarry v. Ashton (1876) L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 314, 45 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 260, 34 L. T. N. S. 97, 24 Week. Rep. 581 (tenant, who maintained a lamp over a foot-path in a condition so defective as to be a dangerous nuisance, was held answerable to a passerby injured by its fall, although he had hired a competent contractor to repair it); Curtis v. Kiley (1891) 153 Mass. 123, 26 N. E. 421 (similar facts); Wilkinson v. Detroit Steel & Spring Works (1889) 73 Mich. 405, 41 N. W. 490 (building so defectively constructed as to be a nuisance); and the other cases cited in 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 14, 176. Why a different principle should be applied where the injury is received by a servant of the party subject to the duty is not apparent, and no court has yet furnished any reason for making such a distinction. See the comment made supra, II. 1, on the New York cases. On the other hand, there is a consideration which points very strongly, if not conclusively, to the conclusion that the case of a servant is precisely the one in which the courts should be most unwilling to allow the interposition of a contractor to shield the master. As has already been shown in an earlier note in this series (Walkowski v. Penokee & Gogebic Consolidated Mines (Mich.) 41 L. R. A. pp. 38-45, and pp. 107-119), a manufacturer who supplies a chattel to another person to be used in his business is not bound to indemnify the vendee's servants for injuries which they receive owing to defects in the chattel. Manifestly the result of applying concurrently this principle and the principle that the master who purchases appliances from a manufacturer is, as regards his servants, entitled to rely upon its fitness for the purposes contemplated, unless there is something to put him on

Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, to recover of the defendants damages in negligently causing his death. In October, 1897, the defendants, under contract with the state, were engaged in deepening the Erie canal in the town of Camillus, Onondaga county. The deceased was working with a gang of men employed by the defendants under the supervision of Orson Seeley as foreman. These workmen were engaged in driving spiles as part of the work they were prosecuting. The canal inquiry as to its condition, is to deny any remedy to servants for injuries due to defects in such appliances. Such a conclusion is simply preposterous and disgraceful to any system of jurisprudence. Either the vendor should no longer be allowed to shelter himself, under the supposed circumstances, by the defense of want of privity of contract, or it should be regarded as an implied term in the contract between the master and his servants that all appliances obtained from parties not in his service are free from all defects which can be prevented by the exercise of that degree of care and skill which is required of persons following the same line of business as the vendor. The latter method of escaping from the absurd predicament into which the law has got itself at this meeting point of the principles under discussion would seem to be the most desirable. Not only would it round off and render entirely consistent the doctrine of absolute duties, but it would obviate the almost insuperable practical difficulties which would, in many instances, block the attempts of servants to obtain redress from vendors of instrumentalities residing in distant localities. There would be no injustice to the master in such rule, for he would still have his action over against the vendor of the defective appliance, and would almost invariably be more favorably situated than his servants for the enforcement of his rights.

1. Massachusetts doctrine not identical with that of other states.

The doctrine which has been involved in Massachusetts is somewhat different from that which prevails in other courts, although in a large class of cases its practical results are quite similar. In some of the earlier cases we find language used which can scarcely be construed otherwise than as an explicit affirmative of the theory of nondelegable duties in the simple form in which it has been enunciated in other jurisdictions.

For the management of his machinery and the conduct of his servants, a master is not responsible to their fellow servants; but he cannot avail himself of this exemption from responsibility when his own negligence in not having suitable instruments, whether persons or things, to do his work causes injury to those in his employ. He cannot divest himself of his duty to have suitable instruments of any kind, by delegating to an agent their employment or selection, their superintendence or repair. A corporation must, and a master who has an extensive business often does, perform this duty through officers or superintendents; but the duty is his, 54 L. R. A.

at this point ran east and west, and was crossed at right angles by a highway, which, about 1,000 feet south of the canal, was intersected by a state ditch, also being excavated by these contractors. The ditch ran from the highway diagonally to the canal, intersecting it some distance west of the highway bridge, thus making a triangle bounded on the north by the canal, on the east by the highway, and on the south and west by the state ditch. The land in this triangle was low, swampy, and apparently useless. The evidence shows that it was covered with grass, wood, stumps, trees, and refuse. On this land, some 40 or 50 yards south of the canal, stood a dead elm tree about 35 feet high, with some ragged stumps or ends of branches projecting from the upper part; the bark had fallen from it; it was weather beaten and decayed. A short disand not merely theirs, and for negligence of his duty in this respect he is responsible. Gilman v. Eastern R. Co. (1866) 13 Allen, 433, 90 Am. Dec. 210.

In Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1872) 110 Mass. 240, 14 Am. Rep. 598, it was held that instructions were properly refused which said the defendants would not be liable for negligence of persons examining a boiler. The court said: "The corporation is equally chargeable, whether the negligence was in originally failing to provide, or in afterwards failing to keep, its machinery in safe condition. The duty is essentially the same. . . . The question was not whether the officers named knew, or might have known, of the defect, or of the incompetency of those who had charge of the repairs, but whether the corporation in any part of its organization, by any of its agents, or for want of agents, failed to exercise due care to prevent injury to the plaintiff from defects in the instrument furnished for his use."

But the position of this court now is, that the master's exercise or non-exercise of a proper supervision over the servants to whom he has delegated the performance of the duties which elsewhere are treated as absolute without qualification is the test to which the question of his responsibility for the negligence of those servants ought to be referred. The most useful explanation of this theory, for the purposes of comparative jurisprudence, is contained in the following passage from the opinion of Field, J., in Rogers v. Ludlow Mfg. Co. (1887) 144 Mass. 198, 59 Am. Rep. 68, 11 N. E. 77: "As a corporation must act by natural persons, and as all large corporations carry on their business by means of servants of different grades, it is manifest that, if it is held that these are all fellow servants, and that the corporation can delegate the whole duty of hiring and superintending its servants, and of providing its machinery and of keeping it in repair, to one or more principal servants, such as superintendents or managers, the corporation may escape all responsibility for injuries caused by defective machinery, except in the few cases where it can be shown that these principal servants were incompetent, or that the directors of the corporation, or its principal officers, knew that the subordinate servants were incompetent, or that the machinery used was defective. To avoid this result, some courts have held that superintendents or managers are not fellow servants with the men employed to work under them, or that servants employed in one department of the business are not fellow servants with those employed in another. Other courts have held that they are all fellow servants, but that the master cannot taunce west were a few other elm trees. Some little distance northwest of this dead elm, and near the canal, was a large quantity of spiles to be used in the work of the defendants. During the morning of the day the plaintiff's intestate was killed, a fire was discovered on the southwesterly or southerly portion of this triangle, which spread rapidly, and, unless checked, it was obvious that the spiles in question would be consumed. These defendants had two other gangs of workmen engaged in excavating on the state ditch under separate foremen. They also employed a walking boss, named Hannan, who was supervising the work generally. The men in all of these gangs were called upon to fight the fire, and did so for a considerable time. Hannan assumed the control of the men, and directed their operations. Some of the men, among whom was the deceased, were engaged in carrying water in pails from the canal to the fire, and in doing so passed a short distance north of the dead elm tree. At the time of the accident this tree had been on fire for about three quarters of an hour, and it was the subject of conversation between Hannan and a workman whether it should be cut down or allowed to burn, Hannan inclining to the latter view. The evidence does not disclose any general apprehension existing among the workmen that the burning tree was an object of special danger. The deceased while engaged with some twenty-five others in carrying water from the canal to fire in the undergrowth, passed, as he had repeatedly done, about 20 feet or more to the north of the burning tree, when it suddenly fell upon him, causing his instant death. The wind at the time was blowing from the avoid his obligation to see to it that reasonable care shall be exercised in procuring suitable machinery, in keeping it in repair, and in hiring and retaining competent servants, by employing a servant to do these things for him; and that if he does employ a servant for this purpose, and the servant does not use due care, the master is responsible. . . . The rule of respondent superior as applied to cases like the present, the exception of injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, and the limitations of this exception, have been established by courts upon considerations of public policy, as well as of the legal principles which govern cases somewhat analogous. If a master who takes no personal part in the management of his business has any duty to perform towards his servants, it is difficult to say that it is always wholly performed by doing two things, namely, by employing competent servants, and by furnishing ample means. In order that the business may be properly managed, the servants should not only be competent, but they should be numerous enough to do, and they should have the means of doing, whatever ought reasonably to be done, and such regulations should be established as will insure the requisite subordination and control, and the exercise of reasonable intelligence and care in the conduct of the business; and it is almost as difficult to define all the duties of the master in these respects as to define the duties of a person under other relations. If it is not the absolute duty of the master to furnish suitable machinery, and if he is not held to warrant that the servants he employs to furnish machinery, or to keep it in repair, shall always use reasonable care, then the duty of a master who does not personally conduct his business, if he is under any duty, we think, must be to use reasonable care in the management, and that is to exercise, or have exercised, a reasonable supervision over the conduct of his servants, as well as to use reasonable care in seeing that his servants are competent, and are furnished with suitable means for carrying on the business." The learned judge then reviewed some of the earlier cases, and proceeded thus: "These decisions show that it is the duty of the master to exercise a reasonable supervision over the condition in which the machinery, structures, and other appliances used in his business are kept by his servants, and that he cannot wholly escape responsibility by delegating the performance of this duty to servants; that the negligence of his servants in repairing or in failing to repair machinery, is not necessarily the negligence of the master, but that it is also to be determined in each case whether the master has exercised a reasonable supervision over his servants, and reasonable care in seeing that his machinery is kept in proper condition, although he may have employed competent servants and furnished them with suitable materials, and instructed them to keep the machinery in repair."

As was said in Johnson v. Boston Tow-Boat Co. (1883) 135 Mass. 215, 46 Am. Rep. 458: "The master is liable in all cases for his own negligence, and that may be shown by a defect of such a nature, or so long continued, as to be of itself evidence of negligence in the master, or the negligence of a servant may be of such a character that negligence of the master may be inferred from it."

We are aware that this rule is somewhat indefinite, and is perhaps not precisely that which generally prevails in the United States. Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert (1886) 116 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 755, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 590; Benzing v. Steinway (1896) 101 N. Y. 547, 5 N. E. 449.

The following extracts will also be found serviceable as elucidating still further the position of the court:

The servant charged with providing these appliances stands in the place of the master, and performs the duty incumbent on him. It is not sufficient that he is an intelligent and competent servant; if he neglects this, the master is still responsible, unless he shall himself have exercised a reasonable care and supervision over him in seeing that the machinery was in proper condition. Nor is it enough that the master has employed suitable servants, and furnished them with suitable materials, and instructed them to keep the machinery in repair. He must see that such servants do their duty. Elmer v. Locke (1883) 135 Mass. 575; Daley v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1888) 147 Mass. 101, 16 N. E. 690.

Perhaps the whole question is whether the master has exercised reasonable care in employing competent servants, in providing suitable machines and implements, and in doing that part of his business which he has undertaken to do himself, and has exercised a reasonable supervision over his servants in the performance of the duties which he has intrusted to them. This is often a question for the jury. Courts have therefore held that they could not say, as matter of law, that a master was not responsible for injuries occasioned by defective machinery, when the defect was substantial and rendered the machine unfit for use, although it was through the neglect of a competent servant that the machine had not been repaired; and they have also held that, when the defect was one that must frequently arise from the use of the machine, and was such that the person employed to superintend the use of the machine south. The defendants were not present during the fire. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, and the appellate division affirmed the judgment entered thereon with a divided court. The prevailing opinion rests upon the theory that the foremen and the walking boss, Hannan, were representing the masters in the prosecution of the regular work, and that when the property of the latter was endangered by fire it was their duty to request the assistance of the men under them to preserve it if possible; that, if the men consented to leave the regular work, and engage in protecting the property, the foreman still represented the masters in the emergency, and owed to the men the same duty as would the masters if personally present. It is conceded that the nature of the work was hazardous, and that plaintiff's intestate assumed the obvious risks, but it is argued that he had the right to expect that he would be warned of any imminent danger which was known to the masters, but of which he had no knowledge. The only alleged negligent act by which it is sought to charge the defendants is the failure of Hannan, the walking boss, to inform the men, including the deceased, who were carrying water in the vicinity of the burning tree, to keep away from it, as it was about to fall. This position assumes that Hannan represented the masters, and, furthermore, that he knew the tree was about to fall.

As to the time when the burning tree would fall, it was matter of opinion, and a subject upon which each person present could exercise his individual judgment. The fact that the tree would fall if the fire continued to consume it was as much an ob-should attend to in order to keep it in running order, the master performed his whole duty by furnishing suitable materials and employing competent servants to keep the machinery in repair. These decisions have been made in cases where it appeared that the defect in the machinery was unknown to the master. The general question is, what, under the circumstances, the master ought reasonably to have known and done, and, in determining this, the nature of the defect, the length of time it has existed, and the means taken to remedy it, are important facts. Rice v. King Philip Mills (1887) 144 Mass. 236, 59 Am. Rep. 80, 11 N. E. 101.

It is the duty of the master to exercise ordinary care in supplying and maintaining machinery, appliances, and instrumentalities; and if the servant exercising ordinary care is injured by a deficiency therein, he is entitled to recover damages. The servant charged with providing these appliances stands in the place of the master, and performs the duty incumbent on him. It is not sufficient that he is an intelligent and competent servant; if he neglects this, the master is still responsible, unless he shall himself have exercised a reasonable care and supervision over him in seeing that the machinery is in proper condition. Nor is it enough that the master has employed suitable servants, and furnished them with suitable materials, and instructed them to keep the machinery in repair. He must see that such servants do their duty. Daley v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1888) 147 Mass. 101, 16 N. E. 690.

The very nature of the implied contract created by the hiring, whereby the master undertakes to use proper care in always providing safe tools and appliances, is inconsistent with his delegation of the duty to a fellow servant, for whose negligence he is not to be responsible. His obligation involves the exercise of every kind of care and diligence which is necessary to give him knowledge of the condition as to safety of his machinery and appliances, so far as such knowledge is obtainable by reasonable effort. His duty relates to the condition of these articles when they come to the hands of his servants for use, and the performance of that duty must carry him just so far into details as it is reasonably necessary to go, in view of the nature and risk of the business, to enable him reasonably to protect his servants from a danger which he should prevent. Moynihan v. Hills Co. (1888) 146 Mass. 592, 16 N. E. 574.

In Coates v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1891) 153 Mass. 297, 10 L. R. A. 769, 26 N. E. 864, a case of an accident caused by the absence of a jaw-strap on a railway car, the court expressly refused to put its decision "on the identification of master and servant, and a union of the knowledge of the corporation and the command of the conductor in one person, by a fiction."

See also, to the same effect, Sweat v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1892) 156 Mass. 284, 31 N. E. 296; Colton v. Richards (1878) 123 Mass. 484; Neveu v. Sears (1892) 155 Mass. 303, 29 N. E. 472.

This theory virtually amounts to holding that there is only one duty which is nondelegable in the sense in which that term is ordinarily understood,—the duty, namely, of efficient supervision over the agents whom he has appointed to represent him in seeing that the various instrumentalities of work are furnished and maintained in a reasonably safe condition. In the language of other courts, the employees who act as his deputies in performing that duty are vice principals.

In Babcock v. Old Colony R. Co. (1890) 150 Mass. 467, 23 N. E. 325, the court, in discussing the question whether there was evidence to warrant the judge in submitting to the jury the question whether the section master was so far charged with the duty of supervision that the defendant might be liable to one of its servants for his negligence, said: "It is well settled that one who is in some things a mere servant may be made the master's agent to perform duties which are primarily personal to the master. Moynihan v. Hills Co. (1888) 146 Mass. 586, 16 N. E. 574, and cases cited. If in the present case the section master was intrusted by the defendant with the performance of the duty, or a part of the duty, of supervision of the tracks which a reasonable regard for the safety of its employees required the corporation to perform, the defendant is liable for his negligence in the performance of it. There was evidence tending to show that different persons had some responsibility in representing the defendant in this respect. A part of the printed instructions to section masters was in these words: 'They will see that no wood, lumber, ties, or other obstructions are piled within 6 feet of the track.' It does not very clearly appear what other measures were taken by the defendant promptly to ascertain the existence of defects or obstructions along the track. The evidence on this branch of the case is rather meagre, but we cannot say that there was not enough to warrant the judge in submitting the question to the jury under the instructions which he gave. It is the duty of a railroad corporation to use reasonable care and diligence to keep its tracks in a safe condition for its employees to work upon. So far as the work of keeping its tracks in repair is left to its servants, it is its duty to exercise reasonable supervious risk of the employment as any other danger which confronted the workmen in this unusual and exciting situation. It may be said, in a general way, that it is the duty of the servant to protect his master's property from destruction by fire or any other cause; but when to do so subjects him to great and unusual danger, he alone must decide the risk to be assumed. This would be so whether the peril to be encountered is regarded as a detail of the work or in the nature of a new employment. The intestate must have realized that the new employment (if it was such) upon which he entered involved risks not incident to the regular work in which he had been engaged for months. The scene was one of great confusion and excitement, with clouds of smoke, sparks, and cinders driven towards the men employed in fighting the fire by a wind from the south. The plaintiff's intestate passed the burning tree a number of times in the course of his employment, and the danger of the situation was as obvious to him as to any other person engaged in the work of saving property; and, if it failed to impress him, he was either negligent or dominated by that excitement and preoccupation usual at such a time. A servant assumes, not only the risks incident to his employment, but all dangers which are obvious and apparent; and so, if he voluntarily enters into or continues in the service, having knowledge, or the means of knowing, the dangers involved, he is deemed to assume the risks, and to waive any claim for damages against the master in case of personal injury. Crown v. Orr, 140 N. Y. 450, 35 N. E. 648; Thomp. Neg. p. 1008; Haskin v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 65 Barb. 129, vision to see that the work intrusted to them is properly done. How far into details this supervision must go before the domain which belongs exclusively to the master is passed, and the domain which may be left to servants is entered, depends upon what it is reasonable to require of a master who is charged with the duty of providing safe works, machinery, tools, and appliances for his employees. In some cases this may be a difficult question to decide. But undoubtedly a jury may find that a railroad corporation should so far supervise the work of its servants in repairing its tracks as to see that a pile of sleepers 3 or 4 feet wide is not left for a long time within 18 inches of the rails in the freight yard of an important station." Commenting on the exception taken to the refusal of the trial judge to instruct the jury that if the defendant had used reasonable care in the supervision of the section men and of the use of the yard, the plaintiff could not recover for the neglect of the section men in leaving the ties by the track, or the neglect of the yard master or the section master or road master in failing to have them removed or to report that they were there, the court said: "This instruction could not properly be given, because it required of the corporation merely supervision of the section men and of the use of the yard, and disregarded the duty of the defendant to use reasonable care in looking after the condition of the road in other particulars. It may have been the duty of the yard master or the road master to exercise this supervision, and, if he discovered neglect, to see that the road was not left in a dangerous condition on account of the neglect. Under the instructions requested the yard master or road master might have used reasonable care in the supervision of the section men, and been negligent in the performance of a part of the master's duty which was incidental to supervision, namely, the correction of the errors which supervision disclosed. We are of the opinion that the instructions were correct and sufficient."

In McCauley v. Norcross (1892) 155 Mass. 584, 30 N. E. 464, the law was laid down as follows: "If the beams were so left that one of them would be liable, as a natural consequence from some intervening cause or agency, to be so moved that it might fall through the floor, the fact that an intervening act or agency occurred which directly produced the injurious result would not necessarily exonerate the defendants from responsibility. Superintendence is necessary in order to guard against injuries from such intervening and inadvertent acts of careless persons as are likely to happen and ought to be guarded against. The question is whether the moving of a beam was so likely to occur that it ought to have been provided against by the superintendent. It might be found that the beams were negligently left near the hole in the floor where they were likely or liable to be toppled over so that one of them might fall through the hole, and thus injure someone below, and that this was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, although some careless person came along and toppled them over."

From the foregoing remarks it is apparent that the Massachusetts decisions in regard to negligence of the kind with which we are concerned in this note stand outside the general current of the authorities. But a connecting link between the doctrine thus formulated and the one which prevails in most American states is supplied by the consideration that it is only in cases which have relation to obligations which, outside of Massachusetts itself, are viewed as being nondelegable, that the ulterior duty of supervision becomes a determinative factor. From the standpoint of other courts those cases may fairly be regarded as authorities for the position that the obligations involved belong to the nondelegable category; and this is the footing upon which they have been, for the purposes of the present inquiry, collated, as to the facts involved, with the rulings in other jurisdictions.

The nondelegable quality of the duty of supervision, so far as it is connected with other duties of the same stamp, is sometimes asserted in the opinions of other courts beside Massachusetts.

A master cannot claim immunity on the ground that he has exercised due care in selecting mechanics of competent skill in the construction of machinery and buildings, but assumes the burden of seeing that such mechanics actually exercise reasonable care and skill in the execution of their work. Collyer v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1886) 49 N. J. L. 59, 6 Atl. 438.

k. Servants may act in a dual capacity.

In the note to O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900: Minn.) 51 L. R. A. 593-596, a number of decisions were cited in which employees who are deemed to be vice principals by virtue of the extent of the control exercised by them were viewed as persons whose negligence is or is not imputed to the master according as they may or may not be discharging one of his absolute duties. The foundations of this theory, as was there shown, are by no means satisfactory; but no objection, either on the score of logic or otherwise, can be made to the theory of such a dual capacity in cases where the vice principalship of Affirmed in 56 N. Y. 608; Jones v. Roach, 9 Jones & S. 248; Wormell v. Maine O. R. Co. 70 Me. 397, 10 Atl. 49; Kennedy v. Manhattan R. Co. 145 N. Y. 288, 39 N. E. 956. The supreme judicial court of Massachusetts held in Leary v. Boston & A. R. Co. 139 Mass. 580, 52 Am. Rep. 733, 2 N. E. 115, that if a servant of full age and ordinary intelligence, upon being required by his master to perform other duties more dangerous and complicated than those embraced in his original hiring, undertakes the same, knowing their dangerous character, and is injured by reason of his ignorance and inexperience, he cannot maintain an action against the master for such injury. If the deceased entered upon a new employment when accepting the invitation of the foreman to assist in extinguishing the fire, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, for reasons already stated. If, on the other hand, the effort to preserve the master's property be regarded as a detail of the regular work, the plaintiff's recovery cannot be sustained.

the delinquent is itself predicated solely from the fact that his delinquency was of such a nature as to constitute a breach of an absolute duty. The doctrine that a representative character is deducible from this circumstance obviously connotes by implication the doctrine that the delinquent employee is not, as regards any other kind of negligence, an agent of the master; and such is the effect of the cases.

One who has not the authority of a general vice principal may be intrusted by the master with the discharge of absolute personal duties that rest upon it, such as the duty to use reasonable care to employ competent and careful fellow servants; and in such a case he may be termed a special vice principal. He stands in the place of the master when he is discharging one of these personal duties of the master, and the latter is liable for his negligence in the discharge of it; but in the performance of his other services as a general employee he is not the representative of the master, nor is the master liable for his negligence in the performance of them. Minneapolis v. Lundin (1893) 7 C. C. A. 344, 19 U. S. App. 245, 58 Fed. 525.

A servant is a vice principal only when he stands in place of the principal with reference to the principal's duty, or in the exercise of the principal's functions. Hanna v. Granger (1894) 18 R. I. 507, 28 Atl. 659.

The relation of a foreman to the other workmen is that of a coemployee, except as to such acts performed by him as were embraced in the duties of the defendant. Mahoney v. Vacuum Oil Co. (1894) 76 Hun, 579, 28 N. Y. Supp. 196.

If the principal is a corporation, or is unable for any reason to discharge these obligations in person, they must be discharged through an officer, agent, or foreman. The person who is thus put in the place of the principal, to perform for him the duties which the law imposes, is a vice principal, and quoad hoc represents the principal so that his act is the act of the principal. This is true, however, only when and so long as his acts are in discharge of the duties which the principal owes to his employees. Beyond this line he acts as a workman, and not as a vice principal. Ross v. Walker (1891) 139 Pa. 42, 21 Atl. 157, 159.

The liability of the master, when the negligence is not his personal act or omission, but the immediate act or omission of a servant, turns upon the character of the act or omission complained of. If the coservant, whose act or Assuming, for the argument's sake, that Hannan was negligent in not warning the deceased that the burning tree was dangerous, and about to fall, the defendants are not liable, as it was no part of their duty to thus protect the deceased, by notice, of a peril that had developed during the progress of the conflagration, and which was equally obvious to all. If there was any negligence on the part of Hannan, it was the negligent act of a coservant. In Loughlin v. State, 105 N. Y. 159, 11 N. E. 371, Judge Andrews pointed out with great clearness the principles of law which determine the liability of the master for injuries caused by the negligence of a coservant. The learned judge, in the course of his opinion, said: "But this liability, when it exists, does not rest upon the doctrine of respondet superior, but solely upon the ground that in the particular case the coservant whose act or neglect caused the injury was, by the appointment of the master, charged with the performance of duties which the omission caused the injury, is at the time representing the master, in doing the master's duty, the master is liable; if, on the other hand, he is simply performing the work of servant in his character as a servant or employee merely, the master is not liable. The injury in the last case supposed would, as between the master and the servant sustaining the injury, be attributable solely to the immediate author, and not to the master. Vitto v. Keogan (1897) 15 App. Div. 329, 44 N. Y. Supp. 1.

It is not the rank of the employee or his authority over other employees, but the nature of the duty or service which he performs, that is decisive. Whenever a master delegates to another the performance of a duty to his servant which rests upon himself as an absolute duty, he is liable for the manner in which that duty is performed by the middleman whom he has selected as his agent, and to the extent of a discharge of those duties by the middleman, however high or low his rank, or however great or small his authority over other employees, he stands in the place of the master, but as to all other matters he is a mere coservant. It follows that the same person may occupy a dual capacity of vice principal as to some matters, and of fellow servant as to others. Lindvall v. Woods (1889) 41 Minn. 212, 4 L. R. A. 793, 42 N. W. 1020.

According to the firmly settled rule of law in this state, Helm, notwithstanding the higher grade of service in which he was employed, was a fellow servant with plaintiff in so far as he served in the places, or with the machinery or appliances, prepared and furnished by the defendant; and, for the consequences to fellow servants of his negligence in the performance of such services in the places, or with machinery or appliances, thus prepared and furnished, the defendant is not responsible. But in so far as Helm was authorized and employed to prepare the places in which other servants were to work, or to furnish the machinery or appliances with which they were to work, he represented the corporate defendant, and his negligence in the performance of these services was the negligence of the defendant, for the injurious consequences of which to other servants, without their fault, it is responsible to the same extent it would have been if such places, machinery, and appliances had been prepared and furnished through the immediate agency of the general superintendent, or of the special super-master was bound to perform for the protection of his servants, a failure to perform which, or a negligent performance of which, by a servant delegated to perform them, is regarded in law the master's failure or negligence, and not merely the failure or negligence of the coservant. . . . In harmony with the general principle that the character of the act is the decisive test, it has been repeatedly decided in this court that the fact that the person whose negligence caused the injury was a servant of a higher grade than the servant injured, or that the latter was subject to the direction or control of the former, and was engaged at the time in executing the orders of the former, does not take the case out of the operation of the general rule, nor make the master liable. Hofnagle v. New York O. & H. R. R. Co. 55 N. Y. 608; McCosker v. Long Island R. Co. 84 N. Y. 77; Allen, J., in Wright v. New York O. R. Co. 25 N. Y. 562, 565; Folger, J., in Loring v. New York C. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 528, 10 Am. Rep. 417." In the case at bar the several foremen and the men under them were engaged as coservants in a laudable effort to protect the property of their employers, assuming voluntarily all the risks involved, and the masters rested under no duty of specially protecting the servants in the changing phases of this emergency. This court has had occasion to deal with the general principle which limits the liability of the master for injuries caused by a coservant in a large number of cases, a few of which we cite: Arnold v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 125 N. Y. 15, 25 N. E. 1064; Cullen v. Norton, 128 N. Y. 1, 28 N. E. 905; Keenan v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 145 N. Y. 190, 39 N. E. 711; Perry v. Rogers, 157 N. A Scotch case was sent back for retrial on the ground that the instructions had not been such as to make it clear to the jury that the defendant would be liable for the negligence of his underground manager in providing a defective rope only if such negligence was committed by him in his representative capacity, as performing a duty delegated to him by the master, and representing the master in the performance of that duty. *Wilson v. The moment that an employee, not vice principal, for general purposes, who has authority to hire an emergency assistant, has completed such a hiring, and, after having resumed his place as servant, enters upon the performance of his work as such, he ceases to represent the master, and becomes a coemployee of the emergency assistant for all purposes. Marks v. Rochester R. Co. (1899) 41 App. Div. 66, 58 N. Y. Supp. 210; former appeal (1894) 77 Hun, 77, 28 N. Y. Supp. 814, Reversed (1895) 146 N. Y. 181, 40 N. E. 782.

Any liability beyond this "is inconsistent with the well-settled rule of the master's duty. It adds to and alters it in ways that cannot be foreseen nor guarded against, and makes the master liable however great may have been his care and diligence in selecting his servants. But it may be said that the converse makes the servant suffer. So it may. Accidents are continually happening from somebody's carelessness. The law gives a remedy in damages against the guilty party, but not against an innocent one. As to strangers, upon principles 54 L. R. A.

of public policy, it treats a master as guilty for the negligence of his servant; but public policy does not demand that he should be so treated as to his own servants who have the option to examine their surroundings in his service, and to receive pay according to the risk they incur. They may sue a fellow servant for his negligence, but to make the master liable for it, unless that servant is taking the place of the master, is contrary to reason and justice." Hanna v. Granger (1894) 18 L. R. A. 507, 28 Atl. 659.

Whether the negligent act in any particular instance did or did not amount to a breach of a nondelegable duty will be determined with reference to the principles established by the cases cited in the following subtitles.

1. Pleading.

A complaint alleging the breach of one or more of the absolute duties of a master is good against a demurrer. Louisville, E. & St. L. Consol. R. Co. v. Miller (1895) 140 Ind. 685, 40 N. E. 116; Camp v. Hall (1897) 39 Fla. 535, 22 So. 792; Wallace v. Standard Oil Co. (1895) 66 Fed. 260; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Swett (1867) 45 Ill. 197, 92 Am. Dec. 206; Nicholas v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. (1899) 78 Minn. 43, 80 N. W. 776; Ressex v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1878) 45 Wis. 477.

A declaration alleging that the defendant carelessly and negligently permitted the track and a car to become and remain defective is sustained by evidence that they became and remained defective through his personal carelessness and negligence in not discovering and remedying the defects, if he took upon himself that branch of the business; or by evidence that he assumed the general management and superintendence of the road, and employed all the workmen, and that from gross negligence he employed no repairmen, or an insufficient number, or unskilful ones, whereby the track and a car became and remained defective. In either case the defects were existing by reason of his own negligence. Fifield v. Northern R. Co. (1860) 42 N. H. 225.

m. Burden of proof.

In the face of proof of injury from illy constructed and unsafe machinery furnished for the servant's use, a court will indulge in no presumption that the master performed his du-

(187 N. Y. 58.)

1. A master is not liable for injury to an employee by reason of failure of his foreman to keep cleaned and oiled an automatic stop designed to prevent the trolley from running off the end of the track of a traveler used to convey metal plates from one place to another in the shop, because of which the stop fails to work and the trolley falls upon the employee.
2. The negligence of a fellow servant is the cause of injury to an employee by the fall of the trolley from the traveler used for conveying metal plates across the shop, where, in disregard of orders, he pulls the trolley towards the end of the track without looking to see whether or not the stop designed to prevent it from running off the end is working, and not the failure of the stop to work.

3. Upon the question of liability of a master for injury to a servant by failure of an appliance furnished for his use to operate as intended, evidence is not admissible of the successful working of another device intended for the same purpose, where it is not shown to be a standard article, and the failure of the one furnished was due to lack of oiling and cleaning, and not to faulty design.

The act of a servant in repairing a ladder will be presumed to be that of a vice principal, where one of the principals testified that the ladder was repaired the evening before the accident by one of the hands, the presumption being that it was done by the direction of the principal. Huth v. Doble (1898) 76 Mo. App. 671 (demurrer to evidence properly refused).

Negligence in running a train at a time when the track was so unsafe that it should not have been run at all will be attributed to the railroad company, rather than to the fellow servants of an employee injured thereby, in the absence of evidence as to who directed it to be run. Stoher v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (1891) 105 Mo. 192, 18 S. W. 991, first appeal (1887) 91 Mo. 511, 4 S. W. 889.

But if the immediate cause of the accident may have been the act of a fellow servant, and the servant seeks to recover on the ground that it was really due to negligence constituting a breach of a nondelegable duty, he will fail unless he satisfies the requirements of the ordinary rule that the burden of proving negligence is upon the person who alleges it.

In Rose v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1874) 58 N. Y. 217, where the train on which the plaintiff's intestate was a brakeman was sent out within three or four minutes of another train, and was itself followed by a third train at about the same distance of time, and the injury which caused the death of the brakeman resulted from the trains being sent out so near together but by whose direction it did not appear, the plaintiff failed to make out a clear case; and the court rendered a decision based upon the theory that the company was not liable for the negligence in not observing the regulations regarding the starting of trains, or in the disobedience.

n. Propriety of instructions.

Any instruction inconsistent with the doctrine of nondelegable duties is properly refused, and if such an instruction is given, it is a ground for reversing a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, as for example, an instruction which directs the jury to find for the defendant, if he used care in the selection of the appliance and of a competent inspector, and the plaintiff's injury was due to the negligence of such inspector in not making proper tests. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Barrett (1895) 14 C. C. 373, 30 U. S. App. 196, 67 Fed. 214.

Or an instruction is erroneous which declares that a corporation is only liable for the negligence of its directors, and not for the negligence of any other officers, whatever their position and duties. Authorities cited in Krueger v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. (1887) 111 Ind. 51, 11 N. E. 937.

Or an instruction that an appliance furnished by the master to his servants to be used by them in the prosecution of their work has been constructed by one who is a fellow servant engaged in the same kind of work with the servant who is injured (see VI. infra) exonerates the master from liability for the consequences of a defective appliance. Jones v. St. Louis, N. & P. Packet Co. (1890) 43 Mo. App. 398.

Or an instruction that if the fall of a roof in a mine was due to the negligence of the mine boss, it was the negligence of a fellow servant. Russell Creek Coal Co. v. Wells (1898) 96 Va. 416, 31 S. E. 614.

It is error to direct a verdict for the defendant where evidence is introduced which would justify the jury in finding that the accident was caused by the negligence of an employee to whom had been delegated the duties of furnishing and maintaining a safe place and safe appliances. Kelley v. Ryus (1892) 48 Kan. 120, 29 Pac. 144.

In an action by an employee to recover of a railway company for injuries sustained by the giving way of a grab iron of a ladder on the side of the car, an instruction that defendant's duty to inspect the car was shown to have been performed by two inspectors when it was put in the train is erroneous in declaring, as matter of law, that defendant had discharged its duty as to the inspection of the car. Thompson v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900) 79 Minn. 201, 82 N. W. 637.

A railroad company, when sued by a stock and fuel agent for injuries due to a defective track, is not entitled to an instruction that the plaintiff cannot recover if he was an employee of the company, and the injury was caused by the negligence of a servant of the company. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Kirk (1884) 62 Tex. 227.

Where the servant injured by the failure of his foreman to shore the sides of a trench properly had nothing to do with its excavation, being merely one of a gang sent, after it had been cut, to lay pipes along it, and there is no evidence tending to show that it became unsafe after he began work, it is not error to refuse to instruct the jury that if they found from the evidence that the defendant had selected a fore-to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles Donohue and Thomas G. Frost, with Mr. Philo P. Safford, for appellant:

Plaintiff having shown the "automatic" to be a new and novel device used by defendants only, it was incumbent upon defendants, to justify a nonsuit, to show that it was reasonably safe by evidence permitting no other reasonable inference. This they made no effort to do.

man who was competent to take charge of the work, and had given him proper instructions, and if the cave-in occurred by reason of the foreman's subsequent neglect to shore up the trench, the neglect, if there was any, which caused the accident was that of a coservant of the plaintiff, and the defendant was not responsible. Baird v. Reilly (1899) 35 C. C. A. 78, 68 U. S. App. 157, 92 Fed. 884.

In a case where no reliance is placed upon the latent character of the defects, an instruction is not exhaustive, and therefore erroneous, which allows a jury to infer that a master has sufficiently discharged his duty of furnishing his servant with a safe scaffold when he intrusts the construction of it to a competent contractor. Macdonald v. Wyllie (1898) 1 Sc. Sess. Cas. 5th series, 339. But see II. g. h, supra.

An instruction to the effect that if the room was a suitable place, and there were proper and suitable means of extinguishing fire, and the means of egress and escape were suitable and proper, and in order and ready for use, then the plaintiff could not recover, is sufficiently favorable to the plaintiff. Keith v. Granite Mills (1878) 126 Mass. 80, 30 Am. Rep. 666.

c. Functions of court and jury.

If there is no dispute as to the facts, and the deduction to be drawn from these facts, under the doctrines accepted in the jurisdiction where the cause of action arose is also clear, the question whether the negligent servant was a vice principal or not as regards a certain act is one of law. Callan v. Bull (1896) 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017.

But if the facts are in controversy, or the evidence is susceptible of two constructions, the proper course is for the court to define the relation of fellow servants, and leave it to the jury to determine whether the employees in a particular case come within the definition. Wilson v. Charleston & S. R. Co. (1897) 51 S. C. 79, 28 S. E. 91.

The trial judge had erroneously ruled that the relation of the negligent and injured servants was one solely for the consideration of the jury. The following distinction was drawn by the supreme court: "Whether an engineer, brakeman, or switchman is, when exercising his ordinary duties, a fellow servant with a car cleaner is a question of law. But whether, in a particular case, either of them was engaged in performing certain acts which the law requires of the master, and which would prevent them from being fellow servants, is a question of fact to be determined by the jury."

the injury was caused by a breach of a nondelegable duty it is error to take the case from the jury. Johnson v. Field-Thurber Co. (1898) 171 Mass. 481, 51 N. E. 18; Scandell v. Columbia Constr. Co. (1900) 50 App. Div. 512, 64 N. Y. Supp. 232.

III. What duties are deemed to be nondelegable.

a. Duties imposed by statute.

So far as it is possible to extract any general rule from the cases, it may, perhaps, be said that the courts proceed upon the theory that, unless the legislature has either expressly or by reasonable implication declared its intention in this regard, a duty imposed upon a master by a statute should be treated as delegable or nondelegable, according as it belonged to one category or the other under the common-law doctrines which previously prevailed in the particular jurisdiction to which the statute applies.

1. Quality of duty unchanged by statute.

On the one hand, the mere fact that certain precautions which concern the proper maintenance of the instrumentalities have been prescribed by statute will not be a sufficient ground for treating the duties thus prescribed as nondelegable, if the court considers duties pertaining to maintenance to be, as a class, delegable. Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 226, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, per Lord Chelmsford. (The statute in question was 23 & 24 Vict. chap. 151, §§ 10 and 22, requiring mine-owners to keep

It was the province of the jury to decide whether this trolley was "properly guarded" in the first instance.

It is obvious that the automatic was made ineffective, and that the defendants' neglect of their statutory duty caused, or helped to cause, the accident. This is evidence of negligence.

McRickard v. Flint, 114 N. Y. 222, 21 N. E. 153.

There was evidence sufficient to go to the jury upon the question whether defendants were negligent as to inspection of the automatic.

up an adequate amount of ventilation, and imposing a penalty for a breach of this provision.) The other law lords declined to express any opinion on this point. But the reasoning and the decision in Hedley v. Pinkney & Sons 8 S. C. [1894] A. C. 222, Affirming [1892] 1 Q. B. 58, are quite in harmony with this view. There it was held that a ship is "seaworthy," within the provisions of the English merchant shipping act (89 & 40 Vict. chap. 80), if it is properly equipped for the safety of the crew in the first instance, and that the mere neglect of the captain to use the equipment furnished will not render her unseaworthy in such a sense as to render her owner liable as for an infringement of the act. The fault in such a case is entirely that of the captain, a mere conservant of the members of the crew. The plaintiff, who was injured by the omission to properly secure a movable section of the ship's railing, contended, without success, that the case comes within the 5th section of the merchant shipping act 1876, which provides that "in every contract of service, express or implied, between the owner of a ship and the master or any seaman thereof, there shall be implied, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, an obligation on the owner of the ship that the owner of the ship and the master shall use all reasonable means to insure the seaworthiness of the ship for the voyage at the time when the voyage commences, and to keep her in a seaworthy condition for the voyage during the same." In the court of appeal, Kay, L. J., reasoned thus: "Leaving a door open or a bolt unshot or a movable railing out of position, as in this case, clearly would not make the ship unseaworthy within that definition. The ship here had all the necessary equipment ready to be used; she was a perfect machine. It was a case of negligence in not using a perfect machine properly. I do not think it can be said that the negligence of the master in allowing a door to be left open or a bolt to be left unshot, or not having a railing placed in position, which was ready to hand, not stowed away in the hold where it could not be got at, or for any other reason unavailable, amounts to a breach of the obligation to keep the ship seaworthy under the act." In the House of Lords the same view prevailed. Said Lord Herschell: "It is quite clear, . . . that the Prodano was not unseaworthy at the time she left the port of London. After she left that port her hull and equipment remained precisely what they were at the time of her departure. She was in all respects efficiently equipped. The fault was in not making use of the equipment with which she had been furnished. Under circumstances such as these, I do not think 54 L. R. A.

It can be said that there has been a failure to keep her in a seaworthy condition for the voyage, within the meaning of the enactment. Following, as it does, the obligation that the owner and the master, and every agent charged with the loading of the ship or the preparing thereof for sea, shall use all reasonable means to insure the seaworthiness of the ship for the voyage, I think the words 'to keep her in a seaworthy condition for the voyage during the same,' point to an obligation of the same character, and not to a neglect properly to use the appliances on board a vessel well equipped and furnished. There is ample scope for the operation of the words in question, even though this construction be put upon the enactment. If any of the necessary appliances were lost or destroyed in the course of the voyage, it would, no doubt, be the duty of the master to use all reasonable means to supply others in their place, just as it might be his duty during the voyage to restore the hull or machinery, if damaged, to a condition suited to the perils to be encountered. But if the appellant's argument were to prevail, it would have a much wider scope than I am able to gather from the words of the enactment was intended by the legislature. The failure properly to secure many parts of the ship which are in ordinary practice open, from time to time, would, no doubt, diminish the safety of those serving on board her, and be a source of danger to them; but I do not think it could reasonably be said that because in such a case a bolt was not securely fixed the vessel thereupon became unseaworthy. In truth, the point is only of importance because of the limitation which the law at present imposes upon a liability of an employer for accidents due to the negligence of his servants; but for this limitation, I do not think it would have occurred to anyone to maintain that there had been, in the present case, a breach of the implied obligation created by § 5 of the merchant shipping act 1876." On the other hand, the acts which have been passed in most of the American states for the purpose of securing the safer operation of mines are held to prescribe duties of the absolute class. Cherokee & P. Coal & Min. Co. v. Britton (1896) 8 Kan. App. 292, 45 Pac. 100 (decision upon Kan. Gen. Stat. 1889, § 3850, which in order to promote the health and safety of the persons employed in coal mines, provides that the owner, agent, or operator shall employ a competent and practical inside overseer, who shall keep a careful watch over the ventilating apparatus, the air ways, traveling ways, pumps and pump timbers, drainage, and roofs of tunnels, and that there shall be sufficient manholes and proper signaling apparatus on

App. 519, 69 Fed. 54 (coal miner does not assume the risk of negligence of the person having charge of the ventilation of the mine, where a statute requires the mine owner to provide for proper ventilation).

A similar doctrine prevails with respect to statutory duties imposed on railway companies to fence their tracks. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Reesman (1894) 23 L. R. A. 768, 9 C. C. A. 20, 10 U. S. App. 596, 60 Fed. 370.

W. 645 (railway company held guilty of actionable negligence, under Mich. Laws 1883, p. 191, where a frog was suffered to remain unfilled so long that knowledge of its condition might be presumed).

2. Quality of duty altered.

On the one hand, the rule which absolves a master from liability for negligence in the erection of a scaffold, where such erection is a part of the work, has been changed by the New York labor law (Laws 1897, chap. 415, § 18), providing that any person employing or directing another to perform labor of any kind in the erection of a building shall not furnish unsafe scaffolding. His duty is not discharged sufficiently by furnishing a sufficient quantity of suitable materials. McLaughlin v. Eidlitz (1900) 50 App. Div. 518, 64 N. Y. Supp. 193; McAllister v. Ferguson (1900) 50 App. Div. 529, 64 N. Y. Supp. 197; Stewart v. Ferguson (1899) 44 App. Div. 58, 60 N. Y. Supp. 429, reiterating doctrine laid down in the first appeal (1898) 84 App. Div. 515, 54 N. Y. Supp. 615. On the other hand, certain statutes which require mine-owners to take specified precautions have received a construction which apparently renders their obligations less onerous than they would have been, if common-law principles had been left to operate. This is virtually the effect of the acts in force in Pennsylvania and elsewhere, by 54 L. R. A.

which mine-owners are required to appoint competent foremen to supervise the underground workings. As we have already seen in the note to O'Neill v. Great Northern B. Co. (1900; Minn.) 51 L. R. A. 535, an appointment made in compliance with the terms of these acts relieves the employer of any further liability with regard to the defective condition of his mine, so far as that condition is the consequence of the nonperformance of duties of the class which the foreman is supposed to discharge.

Another decision illustrating the situation adverted to in the text is Consolidated Coal Co. v. Yung (1887) 24 Ill. App. 255, where it was held that the failure of a coal mining company to furnish props, and prop the clod, dirt, and slate, is not a violation of Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 93, § 16, which only requires that a sufficient supply of timber be kept for props to be sent down when required; and it does not create any common-law liability.

b. Duty to see that the unintelligent instrumentalities of the work are reasonably safe; general rule stated.

Subject to certain qualifications which will be explained in later sections, the doctrine which now prevails in the large majority of the American states may be enunciated in the following terms: A master must indemnify a servant who is injured by the negligence of a co-servant, when the delinquency consisted in a failure to discharge properly either the function of furnishing the instrumentalities with which the business is carried on, or the function of keeping those instrumentalities up to the legal standard of safety while they continue to be used.

A railroad corporation may be controlled by competent, watchful, and prudent directors, who exercise the greatest caution in the selection of a superintendent or general manager, under whose supervision and orders its affairs and business, in all of its departments, are conducted. The latter, in turn, may observe the same caution in the appointment of subordinates at the head of the several branches or departments of the company's service. But the obligation still remains to provide and maintain, in suitable condition, the machinery and apparatus to be used by its employees, an obligation the more important, and the degree of diligence in its performance the greater, in proportion to the dangers which may be encountered. Those, at least, in the organization of the incorporation who are invested with controlling or superior authority in that regard represent its legal personality; their negligence, from which injury with power of control and direction" than Williams was. Williams being a vice principal, that there was at least a question for the jury whether the automatic was properly inspected and cared for by him is obviously indisputable.

results, is the negligence of the corporation. The latter cannot, in respect of such matters, interpose between it and the servant, who has been injured without fault on his part, the personal responsibility of an agent who, in exercising the master's authority, has violated the duty he owes, as well to the servant as to the corporation. Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. (1879) 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. ed. 612. To the same effect, see Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert (1886) 116 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 755, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 590; Northern P. R. Co. v. Peterson (1896) 162 U. S. 846, 40 L. ed. 994, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 843.

The rule of law which exempts the master from responsibility to the servant for injuries received from the ordinary risks of his employment, including the negligence of his fellow servants, does not excuse the employer from the exercise of ordinary care in supplying and maintaining suitable instrumentalities for the performance of the work required. One who enters the employment of another has the right to count on this duty, and is not required to assume the risks of the master's negligence in this respect. The fact that it is a duty which must always be discharged, when the employer is a corporation, by officers and agents, does not relieve the corporation from the obligation. The agents who are charged with the duty of supplying safe machinery are not, in the true sense of the rule relied on, to be regarded as fellow servants of those who are engaged in operating it. They are charged with the master's duty to his servant. They are employed in distinct and independent departments of service, and there is no difficulty in distinguishing them, even when the same person renders service by turns in each, as the convenience of the employer may require. In one the master cannot escape the consequence of the agent's negligence; if the servant is injured in the other he may. Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1872) 110 Mass. 240, 260, 14 Am. Rep. 598. (The theory of the master's responsibility, however, which is now accepted in Massachusetts itself is somewhat different from this. See li. j. supra.)

The doctrine of common employment is not applicable, "where injuries to servants or workmen happen by reason of improper and defective machinery and appliances, used in the prosecution of the work" of the corporation. Harper v. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1871) 47 Mo. 567, 4 Am. Rep. 353.

It was for the jury to say whether de-

the difference, hereafter to be explained (V. h, and VI. a-e, infra) between the position of servants who supply a stock of material from which a selection is to be made as the work progresses and of servants who make that selection; and this distinction is often expressly relied upon as the rationalle of the judgments.

In Lehigh Valley Coal Co. v. Warrek (1898) 28 C. C. A. 540, 55 U. S. App. 437, 84 Fed. 866, the evidence was that, whenever plaintiff needed new blocks he applied for them to the foreman, whereupon the carpenter brought them; that, so far as plaintiff was informed, there was no stock of new ones from which he could supply himself; that plaintiff three days before the accident, and again two days before the accident, called the attention both of the foreman and of the outside superintendent to the condition of the blocks, and asked for sound ones, and that to his request both replied, "All right," and the foreman expressly promised to "give him new blocks right away." The case was held by the court to be distinguishable from those cited by defendant's counsel, where the plaintiff had a stock of new appliances at hand from which to help himself.

Similarly, in Mansfield Coal & Coke Co. v. McEnery (1879) 91 Pa. 185, 36 Am. Rep. 662, we find the court committing itself to this doctrine: If a railroad company exercises ordinary care and skill in the selection of employees to construct a bridge, it will not be responsible for defects resulting from its original construction.

But the master cannot avail himself of the protection afforded by this distinction, where it is negligent under the circumstances to leave the task of selection to the particular servant or class of servants upon whom that function is necessarily thrown in the ordinary course of the master's business.

In McElligott v. Randolph (1891) 61 Conn. 157, 22 Atl. 1094, the court reasoned thus: "While it is true that the defendants intrusted the execution of the work upon which McElligott was engaged to a competent superintendent, provided him, McElligott, with collaborators who endants negligently failed to give decedent a safe place in which to work.

Messrs. Eugene Lamb Richards, Jr., and Arnold W. Sherman, for respondents:

If the failure of the automatic to work was not the proximate cause, but merely the occasion, of the accident, the judgment must be affirmed.

Laidlaw v. Sage, 158 N. Y. 73, 44 L. R. A. 216, 52 N. E. 679.

were fit and competent when under competent supervision, and had upon the premises appliances and apparatus suitable for the work, it is equally true that, during the progress of much of the work, and at the time of and for a considerable time prior to the accident, the work was wholly without competent superintendence, that there was even no one present who was possessed of mechanical skill, that the provision of suitable appliances was simply in the sense of there being such near at hand mingled with others unsuitable, that those appliances which were in fact chosen and set apart for the work were mainly selected by unskilled factory hands at random, and without instructions, oversight, or examination, and that they were adjusted by like laborers with the like absence of instructions, oversight, and examination. The accident happened in part because a certain wooden horse or support was inadequate. Dunning, the superintendent, selected this particular appliance and directed its use. The wheel fell in fact because a certain rope was too small and inadequate. The defendants had done nothing to provide a suitable rope except to have upon the premises a stock of various kinds of rope, some suited to one purpose and some to another, and to allow any chance inexperienced laborer to select for each special use the one which his impulse dictated. Just here we touch upon the most significant and potent factor in the situation, namely, the entire absence of competent superintendence during all the later stages of the work. After Dunning's departure about midnight there was no one, either over or connected with the gang of men employed, who possessed any mechanical knowledge or skill. Had Dunning remained present properly executing his master's duty intrusted to him, there would have been no such unintelligent, haphazard selection of apparatus, no such inadequate and unsuitable devices of support, as were instrumental in McElligott's death. Moreover, Dunning's departure in an instant transformed McElligott and his fellows from fit into unfit co-laborers. The finding states explicitly that these men were incompetent for the work assigned them without suitable supervision. During the hours, therefore, which succeeded Dunning's return home, McElligott was surrounded only by incompetent fellow workmen, and he went down to his death in consequence of constructions and mechanical adjustments made by his fellow servants, employed by the defendants to do, in company with him, what they were unfit to do. Plainly, therefore, the defendants' duties as masters of the deceased were not performed."

client supervision which is a condition precedent to the operation of the rule as to details of work. See VIII. infra.

It is observable, moreover, that the rule which absolves the master from liability for the condition of the place of work, on the ground that it is temporary and transitory, is not available as a defense, when the place is unsafe at the time the servant is brought to the place of work, and no warning is given him of the peril. Hess v. Rosenthal (1896) 160 Ill. 621, 43 N. E. 743.

c. Duty to see that the unintelligent instrumentalities of the work, as originally supplied, satisfy the legal standard of safety.

All the authorities seem to be unanimous as to the doctrine that, where it is a question of the condition of the instrumentalities, animate or inanimate, when they first become a part of the organism through which the master carries on his business, he must, at his peril, see that due care has been exercised in making them safe and suitable for the use of his servants,—at all events, where the agent employed to procure these instrumentalities from a dealer or to manufacture them occupies the position of a servant. See II. h, i, supra.

The principle upon which all the authorities agree is that the master is under what may be termed an absolute duty to his servant of using care, to the end that the machinery put into the hands of his servant for use shall be reasonably safe, having regard to its nature and the purposes for which it is intended. This duty he may discharge, either by himself in person, or by a designated agent or servant. If he discharge it by an agent or servant, the latter becomes, in respect of it, his vice principal, wholly without reference to the rank which in other respects he occupies in his master's or principal's service. Dutzi v. Giesel (1886) 23 Mo. App. 676.

The universality of the acceptance of this doctrine in America is sufficiently demonstrated by the cases cited below. In England it has never been announced in the same explicit, formal manner. But it has been shown in a former note (O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. [1900; Minn.] 51 L. R. A. 571, 572) that the decision of the House of Lords in Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, has by implication left the master responsible for the defaults of employees whose duty it is to supply the instrumentalities. It may therefore be asserted with reasonable confidence that the servant's right of recovery in that country remains, so far as the common law is concerned, exactly what it was, when it was declared by Lord Cranworth in Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid (1858) 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 286, 4 Jur. N. S. 767, that the ruling in Gray v. Brassey (1852) 15 Sc. Sess. Cas. 2d series, 135, was in strict accordance with the English authorities. In the Scotch case, referred to, the complaint was held to be relevant, inasmuch as the plaintiff would be entitled to recovery if he established his allegations that his injuries were due to the negligence of an employee whose function was the providing of safe machinery for the employee who had to use it. The facts alleged were that a brake slipped down when plaintiff stepped in it, in consequence of there being no blocking on it.

The alleged failure to obey the factory act was not the proximate cause of the accident.

Graves v. Brewer, 4 App. Div. 327, 38 N. Y. Supp. 566; Glassheim v. New York Economical Printing Co. 13 Misc. 174, 34 N. Y. Supp. 69; Crown v. Orr, 140 N. Y. 450, 35 N. E. 648; DeYoung v. Irving, 5 App. Div. 499, 38 N. Y. Supp. 1089; Knisley v. Pratt, 148 N. Y. 372, 32 L. R. A. 367, 42 N. E. 986; Monai v. Friedline, 33 App. Div. 217, 53 N. Y. Supp. 482; Hickey v. Taaffe, 105 N. Y. 26, 12 N. E. 286.

No defect was disclosed in the embodiment of the theory in the automatic. No part was shown to be bent or broken or in any way affected by wear and tear, either before or after the accident. The defendants therefore fulfilled their duty in this regard.

In Hall v. Johnson (1805) 3 Hurlst. & C. 589, 24 L. J. Exch. N. S. 222, 11 Jur. N. S. 80, 11 L. T. N. S. 779, 13 Week. Rep. 411, the court emphasized the fact that the master was not shown to have been negligent in regard to putting his mine in proper order.

An appliance constructed to enlarge the capacity of the master's works stands, as respects the nondelegable quality of the duty to see that it is not defective in any respect, on the same footing as if it had been a part of the work when they first began to be operated. Wilson v. Willimantic Linen Co. (1883) 50 Conn. 433, 47 Am. Rep. 653 (operative injured by the fall of a countershaft on some new machinery—superintendent has been notified that a collar was needed).

The selection of appliances out of a stock furnished by the master is a function usually regarded as characteristic of a mere servant (V. h. infra); but in one case it was held, on the ground of his having discretionary authority in the premises, that a master was liable for the negligence of an employee in the choice and use of tackle for the purpose of lowering a heavy piece of machinery into its place. Telander v. Sunlin (1891) 44 Fed. 564. But this decision is scarcely consistent with the general current of the authorities; as the special factor relied upon for purposes of differentiation seems to be present in every instance where the master's duty has been denied to extend beyond the supply of the materials out of which the selection is to be made. See, however, Great Northern R. Co. v. McLaughlin (1895) 17 C. C. A. 330, 44 U. S. App. 189, 70 Fed. 669, 11 C. 10, infra. Some courts seem to limit the application of this doctrine to cases in which the delinquent servants were invested with a controlling or superior authority in respect to the supply of the instrumentalities. This form of expression is used in Cooper v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. (1884) 24 W. Va. 37. But this view is not supported by the authorities as a whole, and is not consistent with the theory that the rank of the offender is entirely immaterial. The rationale of the rule also indicates that its operation is not dependent upon the delinquent's possession of the power of discharging or employing other servants. Allend v. Spokane Falls & N. E. Co. (1899) 21 Wash. 324, 58 Pac. 244.

The reason assigned for the doctrine under discussion, viz., that were the rule otherwise the most important of the duties owed by capital to labor could be evaded by the capitalist employing only his own servants in the construction of his buildings and machinery (Indiana Car Co. v. Parker (1885) 100 Ind. 181), sounds somewhat singular when we consider it in connection with that other rule which, according to some courts (see II. h. i, supra), allows capital to "evade the duty" in question by the simple expedient of abstaining from the "employment of his own servants," and intrusting the work to an independent contractor. A theory of absolute responsibility which may be so easily nullified is little better than a solemn farce. It is only proper, however, to mention that in the state in which the policy of holding capital to its obligations has been thus indorsed, there has been no explicit adoption of this theory which entirely exonerates a master who interposes an independent contractor between himself and his servants; and possibly this court may hereafter enunciate a doctrine upon this point which will not be open to the charge of inconsistency from which it seems impossible to absolve any court which accepts this theory, and at the same time declare that the master must answer for the negligent construction of an instrumentality by any person in his service.

The decisions cited below are referred to as illustrations of the rule enunciated above, for the reason that the use of some such words as "provide," "furnish," "supply," etc., in describing the duty incumbent on the master, may, in some sense, be said to show that the court had in mind the master's responsibility for the original condition of the instrumentalities. But, so far as most of the courts are concerned, it is immaterial whether the dereliction of duty was in respect to original supply or subsequent maintenance; and the absence of any practical necessity for differentiating between the extent of the master's liability in one case or the other has naturally resulted in a certain lack of precision in the phraseology employed.

It is customary to predicate two distinct non-delegable duties in respect to what we have, for convenience sake, styled the unintelligent instrumentalities of work, viz., the duty "to provide reasonable, safe tools, appliances, and machinery for the accomplishment of the work necessary to be done," and the duty "to provide the

The only causes shown i. e., the unexplained failure of the drop bars to fall or the dusty and gummy condition of the oil, being those which arose from the negligent act or omission of the employees as such in the performance of the work or in the use of the automatic, the character of the place, if it was unsafe, was due to the negligence of a fellow servant or the nature of the business, and was a risk which plaintiff's interstate assumed.

If temperature and dust do not fall within the rule that it is the master's personal duty to furnish reasonably suitable appliances and to take reasonable care to discover and remedy defects therein, then the defendants' omission to raise the temperature or remove the dust, whether notified thereof or not, was not the proximate cause of servant with a reasonably safe place to work in, having reference to the character of the employment." Northern P. R. Co. v. Peterson (1898) 162 U. S. 346, 40 L. ed. 994, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 843. But this division of duties scarcely satisfies the exigencies of a logical classification, for the reason that, in a large number of cases, it is difficult, if not impossible, to say with certainty whether the liability of the master for a defective apparatus should be treated as resulting from a violation of his duty to furnish that apparatus, or from a violation of his duty to see that the place of work which was rendered dangerous by the apparatus was safe. The subjoined cases in which the master was held liable are therefore arranged, without regard to the supposed distinction of duties, under headings indicative of the nature of the abnormal danger from which the master's representative failed to protect the injured person. Whether it is explicitly so stated or not, the master was held responsible for the acts of the servants whose negligence was the cause of the various abnormally dangerous conditions mentioned in connection with the citations.

The fellow servant's negligence here was in regard to the use of the defective appliance for work distinct from that upon which the plaintiff was engaged, and the naphtha was exploded by the heat of an adjoining boiler); Bernard v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1894) 78 Hun, 454, 29 N. Y. Supp. 230 (no cars suitable for transporting dynamite were provided). 54 L. R. A.

3. Defective appliances for protecting servants engaged in excavating.

Kranz v. Long Island R. Co. (1890) 123 N. Y. 1, 25 N. E. 206 (servant ordered to perform work as a machinist in underground trenches opened and prepared for him by other employees, held not a fellow servant of the latter); followed in Schmit v. Gillen (1899) 41 App. Div. 302, 58 N. Y. Supp. 458 (servants opening a trench are not, as regards duty to sheath it properly, the fellow servants of other servants who lay pipes in it); Van Steenburgh v. Thornton (1895) 58 N. J. L. 160, 33 Atl. 880 (foreman of work of excavating a trench neglected to take measures to prevent the sides from falling in); Laporte v. Cook (1899) 21 R. I. 158, 42 Atl. 519 (no materials furnished for the servants' protection); Baird v. Rellly (1899) 35 C. C. A. 78, 63 U. S. App. 157, 92 Fed. 884 (foreman, whose duty it is to shore a trench, which is being dug for laying pipes, held not to be a coservant of one of the pipe-layers, who has nothing to do with the work of excavation).

4. Defects in bridges, trestles, etc.

A master is liable for the negligence of employees to whom he delegates the function of building bridges, etc. Davis v. Central Vermont R. Co. (1892) 55 Vt. 84, 45 Am. Rep. 590, Overruling Hard v. Vermont & C. R. Co. (1860) 32 Vt. 473.

Where contractors for the erection of a railway trestle constitute an employee their representative, and impose on him the duty, and confer on him the authority, to supervise, direct, and control its construction, and require the laborers to obey his orders and directions in the premises, that employee stands in the shoes of his employers, and they are responsible for the results of his negligence in the work so committed to his direction, supervision, and control. Woods v. Lindvall (1891) 1 C. C. A. 87, 4 U. S. App. 49, 48 Fed. 62, Affirming 44 Fed. 855.

The supreme court of Minnesota had previously held that the injured servant in this case was not entitled to recover. Lindvall v. Woods (1889) 41 Minn. 212, 4 L. R. A. 798, 42 N. W. 1020. See VI. d, infra.

5. Defects in scaffolds, stagings, etc.

Contrast VI. c-f, infra.

That the master is liable for the negligent selection of the materials to be used in constructing a scaffold has occasionally been expressly laid down. Kansas City Car & Foundry Co. v. Sawyer (1898) 7 Kan. App. 146, 53 Pac.

the accident, and cannot be made a basis of their liability.

Yaw v. Whitmore, 46 App. Div. 422, 61 N. Y. Supp. 731; Kimmer v. Weber, 151 N. Y. 417, 45 N. E. 860.

The condition arose from the omission to perform a detail of the work or from the method of conducting the work. The master, therefore, is not liable, whether the omission or method was that of a foreman or other servant.

Crispin v. Babbitt, 81 N. Y. 516, 37 Am. Rep. 521; Webber v. Piper, 109 N. Y. 496, 17 N. E. 216; Hall v. United States Radiator Co. 52 App. Div. 90, 64 N. Y. Supp. 1002; *Ludlow v. A. 647, 98 Fed. 56 (servant charged by the master with providing lumber for the building of a scaffolding by his fellow servants is in that respect discharging a personal duty of a master, who is liable for his negligence in providing defective and unsafe material); McNamara v. MacDonough (1894) 102 Cal. 575, 36 Pac. 941 (carpenter deputed to construct scaffold for bricklayers and hodcarriers); Brown v. Gilchrist (1890) 80 Mich. 56, 45 N. W. 82 (master held liable for the negligence of his foreman in selecting materials, and superintending the erection of a scaffold). And this is assumed to be the correct doctrine in all those numerous cases in which, for reasons to be hereafter explained, the master is not responsible for the improper construction of the scaffold out of the materials furnished. See VI. d, 8, infra.

The servants constructing a scaffold are deemed to be vice principals whenever the master undertakes to furnish it as a completed instrumentality. Killea v. Faxon (1878) 125 Mass. 485; Brickner v. New York C. & E. Co. (1870) 2 Lana. 506 (where scaffold erected by co-servants collapses, injured person has a right to have the case submitted to the jury, both on the theory that the master was negligent in furnishing a dangerous structure, and on the theory that he was negligent in knowingly keeping incompetent servants in his employ); McCone v. Gallagher (1897) 16 App. Div. 272, 44 N. Y. Supp. 697 (completed scaffold furnished for particular work); Sellick v. J. Langdon & Co. (1891) 37 N. Y. S. R. 511, 13 N. Y. Supp. 858 (scaffold erected where its supports were likely to be struck by defendant's wagons); Green v. Banta (1882) 16 Jones & S. 156; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Scanlan (1897) 170 Ill. 106, 48 N. E. 826, Affirming (1896) 67 Ill. App. 621 (foreman, charged with duty of erecting scaffold to be furnished to workmen in a complete condition, held to be a vice principal); Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Maroney (1897) 170 Ill. 520, 48 N. E. 953, Affirming (1896) 67 Ill. App. 618; Swift & Co. v. Wyatt (1898) 75 Ill. App. 348 (one injured by a fall from a scaffold, caused by the tipping of an unfastened ladder placed in position before the servant was employed and directed to use it, held entitled to recover therefor, although the ladder was placed by a fellow servant); Whalen v. Centenary Church (1876) 62 Mo. 326 (seems to be based on the non-assignability of the duty to provide a safe scaffold, but the real ground of the decision is somewhat obscure); Haworth v. Seevers Mfg. Co. (1892) 87 Iowa, 765, 51 N. W. 68, 62 N. W. 325 (superintendent

Co. 142 N. Y. 31, 36 N. E. 813; Vitto v. Keogan, 15 App. Div. 329, 44 N. Y. Supp. 1; Kimmer v. Weber, 151 N. Y. 417, 45 N. E. 860; Cahill v. Hilton, 106 N. Y. 512, 13 N. E. 339; Mahoney v. Vacuum Oil Co. 76 Hun, 579, 28 N. Y. Supp. 196.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover damages resulting from the death of the plaintiff's intestate, which was caused, as it is alleged, by the negligence of the defendants. In 1896 the defendants, as copartners, carried on a manufacturing business in the city of New York, and the plaintiff's intestate was employed by them as an ordinary laborer about the works. The room in which he worked was about 60 feet long north and south by 50 feet wide east and of construction of a building held to be a vice principal as regards the erection of a scaffold); Brown v. Gilchrist (1890) 80 Mich. 56, 45 N. W. 82 (foreman intrusted with the entire control of the erection of a scaffold—injury was received after the scaffold was finished); Kansas City Car & Foundry Co. v. Sawyer (1898) 7 Kan. App. 146, 53 Pac. 90 (scaffold already complete when plaintiff was set to work on it).

That this was the character of the implied contract in regard to such a structure is usually inferable where it was erected by a set of servants different from that to which the plaintiff belonged. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Maroney (1897) 170 Ill. 520, 48 N. E. 953, Affirming (1896) 67 Ill. App. 618 (scaffold built by carpenter for masons to use); McNamara v. MacDonough (1894) 102 Cal. 575, 36 Pac. 941 (carpenter employed by the day by an architect having the management of the construction of a building for the owner, to erect a scaffolding for the use of masons and hodcarriers employed in the construction of the building); Cadden v. American Steel Barge Co. (1894) 88 Wis. 409, 60 N. W. 800 (riveter upon the side of a vessel, who uses a scaffold, is not a fellow servant with the scaffold builders whom the master employs to adjust the scaffold for him, although the former indicates where it is to be placed).

Where, on the trial, it is shown that a defendant had in his employ a crew of men, whose exclusive work and duty it was to put up such staging and scaffolding as, from time to time, was needed for the use of workmen engaged in defendant's general work and business, the presumption arises that a staging found in position at the place where a workman is required to perform his work, and upon which he is obliged to stand to perform it, was built by one or more of the staging crew; and, as the men composing such a crew are not fellow servants of men engaged in the defendant's general work, any of the latter may, if injured by defects in the staging, recover damages. Sims v. American Steel Barge Co. (1894) 56 Minn. 68, 57 N. W. 322; and the cases cited in VI. d-f, 1, infra.

Sometimes the circumstance emphasized is that the scaffold was one erected for permanent use, and is therefore distinguishable from one erected as a part of the work merely (see VI. f, 1, infra). Edward Hines Lumber Co. v. Ligas (1898) 172 Ill. 315, 50 N. E. 225, Affirming (1896) 68 Ill. App. 523 (scaffold erected for permanent use in removing lumber from the top of a pile).

If the scaffold was unsafe for the work which the injured servant was ordered to do, the master cannot excuse himself on the theory that it was sufficient for the work for which it was west. In the center was a machine known as a "punch," which was used for the purpose of making holes in heavy iron plates. Over this punch, about 16 feet from the floor, was a traveler, consisting of three sections, each about 20 feet long, which, when joined together, made a continuous track, with sides projecting from the base, upon which a trolley ran. The trolley had chains hanging down, which were used to attach the plates, for the purpose of transportation, to the punch. Each section of the traveler could be disconnected from the others, and moved east or west 8 or 10 feet, where it could be united to another traveler and form a part thereof. When the three sections were together the trolley could not run off, but when one of the sections was gone the trolley, if put in motion, would run off as soon as it reached the space which had been occupied by the absent section. As a safeguard against this danger the defendant Levering, a mechanical engineer of long experience, had invented an automatic drop bar, one of which was attached to either end of each section. It consisted of a series of levers so arranged that when the sections were all together the drop bar would be up in the air and the trolley could be moved without difficulty, but when one of the sections was gone the drop bar was forced down by a counterweight and the trolley could not be moved. This device was new, having been used in the shop in question for about six months, and for about eight months in another shop belonging to the defendants in Philadelphia, but not elsewhere. Although in constant use, it had never failed to work prior to the time when Quigley, the decedent, lost his life, except originally erected. Richards v. Hayes (1897) 17 App. Div. 422, 45 N. Y. Supp. 234.

Sometimes the fact that the servants deputed to erect the scaffold did not possess sufficient skill to qualify them for doing the work properly furnishes an independent ground for compelling the master to answer for injuries caused by defects in the structure. Donnelly v. Booth Bros. & H. I. Granite Co. (1897) 90 Me. 110, 87 Atl. 874 (owner of quarry, who employs common laborers engaged in stowing stone posts in a schooner to suspend a platform to be used in loading the vessel with heavy stone, and to select the gear by which the platform is suspended, held liable for injury to another employee while engaged in loading the vessel, caused by the breaking of a defective rope selected by them).

6. Defects in other structures.

The delinquent employees were held in the following cases to be vice principals: McCampbell v. Cunard S. S. Co. (1898) 69 Hun, 181, 23 N. Y. Supp. 477 (omission of dock superintendent to have the wedge-shaped "mouthpiece" properly fastened to the skid or gangplank upon which tracks are drawn from a ship to a dock by stevedores is not a risk assumed by the latter); Welty v. Lake Superior Terminal & Transfer R. Co. (1898) 100 Wis. 128, 75 N. W. 1022 (servant who had to climb a railway semaphore was injured by its negligent construction); Van Dusen v. Letellier (1889) 78 Mich. 492, 44 N. W. 572 (defects in lumber-yard dock discoverable by reasonable care).

7. Unguarded machinery.

Darby v. Duncan (1861) 23 Dunlop, Sc. Sess. Cas. 529.

8. Unguarded openings in floors, etc.

Johnson v. Field-Thurber Co. (1898) 171 Mass. 481, 51 N. E. 18 (no guards furnished by employers for trapdoor—coservant in leaving trapdoor open held not to be, as matter of law, guilty of negligence causing the injury).

9. Defective pipes.

McDade v. Washington & G. R. Co. (1886) 5 Mackey, 144 (defective pipe in mine caused a fire); Nixon v. Seiby Smelting & Lead Co. (1894) 102 Cal. 458, 36 Pac. 803 (servant scalded by the severing of a rubber hose improvised by the foreman of the silver-room of a smelting company for the purpose of conveying acid into the waste tank).

10. Defective appliances for loading and unloading vehicles.

A complaint alleging that a foreman selected unsafe skids for the purpose of unloading a car has been held not demurrable. Great Northern R. Co. v. McLaughlin (1895) 44 U. S. App. 189, 17 C. C. A. 380, 70 Fed. 669.

But, in view of the cases cited in V. j. infra, this ruling seems to be of dubious correctness (compare, however, Telander v. Sunlin (1891) 44 Fed. 504, cited supra). Kain v. Smith (1880) 80 N. Y. 458 (1881) 25 Hun, 146 (jigger used for loading heavy wheels defective to knowledge of yard foreman).

11. Defective locomotives.

Cumberland & P. R. Co. v. State use of Moran (1875) 44 Md. 283 (1876) 45 Md. 229 (agent for purchase of locomotive is a vice principal); Krueger v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. (1887) 111 Ind. 51, 11 N. E. 957 (tender with deck 8 or 4 inches higher than that of engine broke away from engine in consequence of the excessive lost motion thereby produced, and allowed plaintiff's decedent to fall on the track).

12. Defective railway cars.

Fredericks* (1874) 71 Ill. 294 (car with too short a draw-bar sent out); Taylor v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1891; Mo.) 16 S. W. 206 (defective coupling furnished); Troxler v. Southern R. Co. (1899) 124 N. C. 189, 44 L. R. A. 313, 32 S. E. 550 (defective couplings); Griffin v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1889) 148 Mass. 143, 1 L. R. A. 698, 19 N. E. 168 (suitable links for coupling cars not furnished in sufficient number); Gray v. Brasey (1852) 15 Ct. of Sess. Cas. 2d series, 135 (defective brake); Approved as to this point by Lord Cranworth in Bartonshill Coal Co. v. McGulre (1858) 8 Macq. H. L. Cas. 300, 4 Jur. N. S. 773, 1 Paterson, Sc. App. 789; McIntyre v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1895) 163 Mass. 189, 39 N. E. 1012 (not enough for a railway company to furnish suitable lumber for side stakes on flat cars); Pennsylvania R. Co. v. La Rue (1897) 27 C. C. A. 363, 81 Fed. 148, 55 U. S. App. 20 on one occasion, which was not reported to the defendants or their superintendent. What then caused it to fail did not appear, but no defect in design, materials, or construction was shown. Quigley was at work in the shop when the automatic device was first used, and he continued working there, with an interval when he was absent, until the accident happened. On the 16th of December, 1896, Quigley and one Jones were working about the punch as assistants to Mr. Berterman, who operated the punch and sometimes helped work the trolley. The trolley had not been used for two hours, as they had been moving plates by means of a vehicle, called a "buggy," which ran upon wheels resting upon the floor of the shop. After a while, in order to move a heavy plate, Berterman called for the trolley, which at the time was hanging over the punch. Not long before the north section had been moved over to the west, and the drop bar on the middle section was up, which showed that it was not working. The north end of the middle section of the traveler was almost over their heads, and the drop bar, being up, was a conspicuous object in plain sight, so that if they had looked up they could have seen that the trolley would fall if set in motion towards them. They were in a hurry and did not look up, but Jones, when the trolley was called for, seized one of the depending chains and gave a quicker and heavier pull than usual towards the place where he and Quigley were standing, which was right under the space occupied by the north section when in line. As the drop bar was up and did not work, the trolley, weighing over 50 pounds, ran off, fell down upon Quigley, (standards used for retaining timber on flat car deemed to be part of its equipment in such a sense that the duty to select proper ones is nondelegable); Followed in Port Blakely Mill Co. v. Garrett (1899) 38 C. C. A. 342, 97 Fed. 587; Bushby v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1887) 107 N. Y. 874, 14 N. E. 407 (servant charged with duty of furnishing side stakes for a lumber car held to be a vice principal); Dougherty v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. (1892) 45 N. Y. S. R. 154, 18 N. Y. Supp. 841 (counsel for defendant had agreed that whatever was done to lengthen the drop stakes was merely part of the operation of loading the car. See IV. o. 3, infra); Indiana, I. & L. R. Co. v. Snyder (1895) 140 Ind. 647, 39 N. E. 912 (timber known to be unsuitable put in handle of hand-car).

On the ground that a conductor was a vice principal as regards the duty of providing a safe and suitable car for laborers who were being conveyed from the place of their work, a railway company has been held liable for injuries received by a laborer, owing to the failure of the conductor to fasten a gate on the platform of a car, as the rules of the company required. Pendergast v. Union R. Co. (1896) 10 App. Div. 207, 41 N. Y. Supp. 927. But it is difficult to see how this decision can be sustained without breaking in upon the rule that the master is not liable where the proximate cause of the injury was the negligence of a fellow servant.

who was getting a plate ready to attach, and inflicted injuries which soon caused his death. At this time, 10 or 12 feet away, the north section was in plain sight, with the chains, supporting a load of iron, hanging down to within 2 feet of the floor, all of which they could see without looking up. The drop bar did not work, because the oil on the sliding plates had become gummy, as the weather was cold, and some dust had settled upon a surface an inch and a quarter long. No dust could reach this spot when the sections were together, as they had been for three weeks prior to the day of the accident, during which period they had not been oiled. Immediately after the accident the apparatus was examined and found in good order, and a ladder, put up to make the examination, as it struck the traveler, caused the drop bar to fall. Sometimes the drop bar fell when the sections were in line, but this did no harm, except to require replacement before the trolley could be moved. It was the duty of Williams, the foreman, to take general charge of the shop and men, and to see that the machinery was kept in good order and the work properly done. He sometimes cleaned and oiled the automatic device, but it was generally done by the workmen; suitable materials being furnished for the purpose. The duty of Bruggeman, the superintendent, was to see that the foreman carried out the orders sent from the office. Scherveman was the outside superintendent, whose duties were not fully described. All the men, including Quigley, had been instructed to look up to the drop bar, to "watch for that thing up there," and see that everything was all right before using the trolley. Ev-

To render the master liable on the ground that an employee was negligent in furnishing defective materials, it must be shown that such employee was authorized to supply the materials which caused the injury. Hoppin v. Worcester (1885) 140 Mass. 223, 2 N. E. 779. There the committee on highways of a city directed the commissioners to erect a building to be used to contain a machine for crushing stone for the highways of a city. The commissioners employed A, a master builder, to furnish the labor and tools required in the erection of the building. The city paid A and the men employed by him, for their services, and furnished all the materials used in the erection of the building. A directed B, one of the men employed by him, to erect a staging for the purpose of shingling the roof of the building, and to use therefor certain brackets which belonged to A. B used the brackets for the support of the staging. One of the brackets, being defective, broke, and the staging upon which C was working fell, and he was injured. Held, that C could not maintain an action against the city for his injury. The court said: "It is argued that Gates, in supplying the defective bracket, acted as the agent of the defendant in furnishing materials, and not as its servant to construct the staging, and was not, in that respect, a fellow servant with the plaintiff. But Gates had no authority from the defendant to furnish materials for it, and it was not as its agent for that purpose that he used his own brackets to support the staging. If not strictly tools required to be furnished by him, they are implements prepared and kept by him for the purpose of supporting stagings, which he might use under his contract with the defendant. He had no other authority from the defendant for furnishing them. The defendant employed him to furnish the labor and tools in the erection of 54 L. R. A.

the building from materials to be furnished by the defendants, and it provided for furnishing all materials needed. The negligence which the evidence tends to prove is that of servants in constructing an unsafe staging, and not that of the master in not furnishing proper materials."

In Kimmer v. Weber (1897) 151 N. Y. 417, 45 N. E. 860, one of the grounds on which recovery was denied was that it was not shown that the plumbers' scaffold which gave way was only part of the material furnished by the defendants or the foreman, or that they contemplated the use of it for the purpose to which it was put.

In Keenan v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1896) 145 N. Y. 190, 39 N. E. 711, where a foreman of car repairers was held not to be a vice principal in directing a subordinate to go on a track not ordinarily used for repairing purposes, and not protected by any rules, for the purpose of getting a car-spring which he needed in his work, the court said: "It is admitted by the learned counsel for the appellant that there is no direct evidence in the case showing that it was any part of Tracy's duty to furnish materials required by the workmen under him, but he insists that the defendant having failed to designate any one person whose duty it should be to borrow springs from other cars for temporary use, and still continuing the business of car repairing, it not only acquiesced in the gang foreman procuring such materials, but impliedly authorized them to procure them wherever they could. The appellant's counsel also admits that Tracy was the fellow servant of the intestate in everything except in the performance of a duty which the law imposed upon the defendant, viz., procuring materials for use. We are unable to adopt these views. It would lead to the establishment of an exceedingly unsafe rule to hold that a gang boss over forty or fifty men could, without direct authority from the company, change the safe and proper rules in pursuance of which the work in the repair yards was conducted, and direct workmen to prosecute their labors under cars standing on tracks other than the regular duly protected repair tracks. Tracy was in no legal sense the representative of the defendant when he suggested to the intestate that he should procure a spring from a car standing on track No. 8; he was a fellow servant making a very unwise and dangerous suggestion."

In Callaway v. Allen (1894) 12 C. C. A. 114, 24 U. S. App. 388, 64 Fed. 297, a master was declared not to be liable for an injury to an employee through the failure of an additional device provided by the employees in violation of every week each man was paid by money placed in an envelope on which was printed the following: "Notice. All employees are cautioned to exercise all possible care to prevent accidents, and are forbidden to use any tools, rope, timbers, or other appliances without carefully inspecting same to see that they are in good order." This notice was signed by the defendants, under their firm name. The defendants had never heard that the drop bar had once failed to work, and it had been frequently examined by one of them, who always found it in good order.

The relation of master and servant existed between the decedent and the defendants. It is the duty of a master to exercise reasonable care to furnish safe machinery for his servants to use, and to keep the same in reasonably safe repair. He is not bound, as a carrier of passengers may be, to provide the best possible machinery or the safest the orders of the superintendent, for the purpose of making the work easier to themselves, although the ground of his prohibition was that it was a hindrance to the work, and not that it was unsafe. "As we understand the contention of the appellee," said the court, "it is this: That it is the absolute duty of the master to furnish safe and suitable machinery and appliances; that this duty cannot be delegated; and that, therefore, when the foremen, Thompson and Anderson, constructed this dangerous device, and used it, the receiver became liable for its use, though it was wholly unknown to him, and neither himself nor his general superintendent, nor superintendent of bridges and buildings had provided it, or authorized its use. This contention, we think, is not maintainable. A railroad corporation must act through its agents, and where a railroad is in the hands of a receiver, the receiver represents the company, and acts through its agents in the same way. Of course, the receiver must use all reasonable care to provide suitable machinery. The evidence shows that he did so provide in this case. The employees, however, were not satisfied with it; and they themselves provided something in addition that would make the work of lifting timbers easier for them though the evidence showed that it was rather a hindrance than a help to the progress of the work. It is true, the superintendent of bridges knew that this device had been used, and its use had been forbidden by him; and he had very recently told foreman Anderson to throw it away, and that if he used it he should hold him responsible. . . . The objection to its use seemed to be founded wholly upon its want of effectiveness in aiding the work. No suggestion was made by Johnson or the men that it was not safe. The most that can be said of the superintendent is that he did not succeed in stopping the use of the device. Probably, his objection that it retarded the work may have been the reason why the men afterwards tried to carry three stringers at a time instead of one and two, as they had done before. We do not think, under the circumstances, that the receiver should be held liable for the use of this device. He neither furnished it, nor authorized its use. It could not be expected that he or the superintendent should be present at all times and at all places to see that such a device was not used, or that they should take means to destroy it, or prevent its use by force. The orders of the superintendent were disobeyed and his wishes disregarded by the employees, and the responsibility for its use should rest with them." 54 L. R. A.

appliances known, but only such as are reasonably safe when used with reasonable care. He is not called upon to procure other devices to secure greater safety, provided those furnished by him are reasonably safe. The test of responsibility is not whether he omitted to do something that he could have done, but whether he was reasonably careful and prudent. Kern v. De Castro & D. Sugar Ref. Co. 125 N. Y. 50, 25 N. E. 1071; Hickey v. Taaffe, 105 N. Y. 26, 12 N. E. 286; Marsh v. Chickering, 101 N. Y. 396, 5 N. E. 56. The servant assumes the ordinary risks of the service in which he is engaged, or such as he may discover by the use of reasonable care, as well as the risk of injury from the negligence of competent fellow servants. Perry v. Rogers, 157 N. Y. 251, 51 N. E. 1021; Hussey v. Cogger, 112 N. Y. 614, 3 L. R. A. 559, 20 N. E. 556; Sweeney v. Berlin & J. Envelope Co. 101 N. Y. 520, 54 Am. Rep. 722, 5 N. E. 358. There is no

d. Duty to see that the unintelligent instrumentalities are maintained in a suitable condition for the work to be done.

Most of the courts which apply the doctrine illustrated by the decisions cited under the last subdivision have also adopted the doctrine that from the moment an instrumentality is, or by the exercise of reasonable care might have been, known to be defective, an absolute duty on the master's part arises, either to remedy the defect, or to cease using the instrumentality.

A master is "equally chargeable, whether the negligence was in originally failing to provide, or in afterwards failing to keep his machinery in safe condition." Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1872) 110 Mass. 240, 14 Am. Rep. 598. Quoted with approval in Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. (1879) 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. ed. 612.

It is well settled that it is the duty of the master to provide suitable and safe machinery and appliances for the use of his operatives; and we think it is also settled that his duty does not stop there, but that it is likewise his duty to keep such machinery in proper repair and safe working order; and if these duties, or any of them, are negligently performed, and one of the servants thereby sustains an injury, the master is liable, even though he may have intrusted the performance of such duties to subordinates by whatever name they may be called, and even though the master may have exercised due care in the selection of such subordinates. Gunter v. Graniteville Mfg. Co. (1882) 18 S. C. 274, 44 Am. Rep. 573.

The nondelegable quality of the duty to discontinue the use of instrumentalities known to be defective is seldom adverted to explicitly. See Indiana Car Co. v. Parker (1885) 100 Ind. 181; Doig v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. (1897) 151 N. Y. 579, 45 N. E. 1028 (duty to abandon a dangerous system). But the predication of such a quality is so obviously a necessary corollary of the existence of a duty as to maintenance that specific authority for it is scarcely required. In other words, the duty of furnishing suitable and safe instrumentalities for the use of the servants includes the duty of maintaining them in safe condition. "Repairing is in a sense, furnishing." Tierney v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1885) 33 Minn. 311, 53 Am. Rep. 33, 23 N. W. 229. That is, the duty to provide safe instrumentalities is a continuous one. Indiana Car Co. v. Parker (1885) 100 Ind. 181; Nail v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. (1891) 120 Ind. 268, 23 N. E. 183, 611. It follows, therefore, that the defense of com-evidence that the automatic device in question was defective or unsafe in itself. The only danger was from neglecting to oil and clean it and the machinery with which it was connected. Cleaning and oiling are not the work of a master, but of a servant, and hence can be delegated to a competent person without responsibility for his negligence. Webber v. Piper, 109 N. Y. 496, 499, 17 N. E. 216. Williams was not a vice principal with reference to this subject, at least, but a fellow servant, and his negligence and that of the men under him in failing to oil and clean the machinery was not chargeable to the defendants. Crispin v. Babbitt, 81 N. Y. 516, 37 Am. Rep. 521. The duty of inspection did not, under the circumstances, extend to oiling and cleaning, which were mere details of the work, but was confined to the condition of the machinery with reference to defects or the want of repairs. Oregan v. Marston, 126 N. Y.

568, 27 N. E. 952. The work was not so complex as to require further rules or instructions than such as were given. Jones was also a fellow servant of Quigley, and his failure to obey orders and look up to see whether everything was all right overhead before he pulled the trolley towards the place where they stood was not the negligence of the defendants. No part of the machinery was concealed, but all, including the drop bar as it stood up, was in plain view. A glance upward would have shown that the north section of the traveler was out of line, and that the drop bar was not working, while a glance to the west would have shown the missing section, loaded with iron plates. Thus there was warning of danger from two independent directions, but both were disregarded. While Quigley was busy getting a plate ready to put the chain around it, Jones was not occupied. He had been instructed not to use the trolley soon employment is not available where the defects which caused the injury would not have existed if the servant whose appropriate function it was to keep the defective instrumentality up to the legal standard of safety and efficiency had adequately discharged his duty.

An instruction that "the defendant would be responsible for the consequences of any want of diligence or due care or caution on the part of those whose duty it was to make repairs" is correct. Cowan v. Umbagog Pulp Co. (1897) 91 Me. 26, 39 Atl. 340.

The master must, of course, also answer for defects resulting from the negligence of a servant in altering a machine. Compare II. f. infra.

It is proper to draw attention here to a doctrine to which we shall recur in a later subdivision (see VIII.), that, even if the dangerous conditions which caused the injury were originally due to negligence which is deemed characteristic of mere servants, as distinguished from vice principal (see IV., V., VI., VIII., infra), the responsibility for those conditions is shifted to the master as soon as he has ascertained, or might by the exercise of reasonable care have ascertained, that they exist. The general principle which thus becomes controlling has been fully discussed in a note to Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines (1898; Mich.) 41 L. R. A. pp. 33 et seq.

The master is chargeable with knowledge which any employee intrusted with the duty of keeping instrumentalities in repair may acquire regarding their condition. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Stein (1894) 140 Ind. 61, 39 N. E. 246. See, generally, note to Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines (1898; Mich.) 41 L. R. A. pp. 132 et seq.; Strauss v. Haberman Mfg. Co. (1897) 23 App. Div. 1, 48 N. Y. Supp. 425.

Even in cases where it may be conceded that there was no duty of regular inspection of the tools in use imposed upon the supervising officers of the defendant, and he trusted to the daily inspection of the man who used the tools for information as to their condition of repair, yet, when such information was given to them, they (those officers), and not the plaintiff, are the proper agents to fulfil the master's duty in furnishing reasonably safe tools. Lehigh Valley Coal Co. v. Warrek (1898) 28 C. C. A. 540, 55 U. S. App. 437, 84 Fed. 866.

The illustrative decisions cited below are arranged under headings corresponding as closely as may be to those employed for the purposes of classification in the preceding subdivisions, and showing the nature of the specific dereliction of duty involved.

1. Defective railway tracks.

In some cases, under the head in which liability has been imposed, the delinquent has occupied a position higher than that of servants actually engaged in the manual work of repairing tracks. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Moore (1884) 31 Kan. 197, 1 Pac. 644 (roadmaster was delinquent here); Anderson v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1895) 107 Mich. 591, 65 N. W. 585 (company held liable to a brakeman on the ground that the assistant roadmaster had sent the section foreman to repair the track, but did not see that the defect was remedied); Palmer v. Utah & N. R. Co. (1887) 2 Idaho, 290, 13 Pac. 425 (station agent failed to report condition of track); Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Elliott (1880) 1 Coldw. 611, 78 Am. Dec. 506 (engineer did not report defects in track); Colorado C. R. Co. v. Ogden (1877) 3 Colo. 499 (assistant superintendent had notice that track was defective); Bessex v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1878) 45 Wis. 477 (yard master is a vice principal as to the act of leaving a dangerous obstruction, like a pile of lumber, near the track).

But the application of the general principle is by no means restricted to such employees. That the master must answer for the negligence of the trackmen themselves, and more especially of the foremen of gangs engaged on repairs, has been frequently affirmed. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Ward (1894) 10 C. C. A. 166, 18 U. S. App. 658, 61 Fed. 927 (dangerous hole left by ballasting crew); Southerland v. Northern P. R. Co. (1890) 43 Fed. 646 (pile of ashes left on the track); St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Weaver (1886) 35 Kan. 412, 57 Am. Rep. 176, 11 Pac. 408; Kentucky C. R. Co. v. Ryle (1892) 13 Ky. L. Rep. 862, 18 S. W. 938 (tie left on track threw brakeman off of a switch engine); Snow v. Housatonic R. Co. (1864) 8 Allen, 441, 35 Am. Dec. 720; Balhoff v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1895) 106 Mich. 606, 65 N. W. 592 (failure to level depression caused derailment); Drymala v. Thompson (1879) 26 Minn. 40, 1 N. W. 255 (rail taken up without setting proper signals to warn approaching trains); Hall v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1891) 74 Mo. 298 (obstruction); Vautrain v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (1880) 8 Mo. App. 538 (dangerous hole left by section-hands); Elfield v. Northern R. Co. (1860) 42 N. H. 225 (track allowed to become blocked with snow and ice); Wellman v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (1892) 21 Or. 530, 28 Pac. 625 (failure to report defects); Carlson v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (1892) 21 Or. 450, without looking up to see that all was in order, yet he pulled it towards Quigley quicker and harder than usual without looking to see whether he was thereby pulling a heavy weight down on Quigley's head. There was nothing to divert attention or excuse his violation of orders. The defendants were not shown guilty of negligence that contributed to the accident, which was conclusively proved to have been caused wholly by the negligence of fellow servants of the decedent. Cullen v. Norton, 126 N. Y. 1, 26 N. E. 905; Loughlin v. State, 105 N. Y. 150, 11 N. E. 371; Devlin v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 470, 42 Am. Rep. 311; Hofnagle v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 55 N. Y. 608.

Several exceptions relating to the admission of evidence were taken by the plaintiff, only one of which requires the expression of consideration. An expert, called by the plaintiff, was asked to "state whether or not a device for the purpose of preventing the trolley from running off the north end of the middle section, and the north end, if as it was placed there, could have been placed upon that section with a positive action so as to prevent the running off of the trolley unless some rigid part broke." Notwithstanding the objection of the defendants was sustained, the witness answered: "I know of another device in practical use designed to prevent the running off of trolleys placed upon sections arranged in line so as to be put as desired out of line. I have a sketch of it here." He was then asked if he knew where that device was in use, and the objection that the evidence was irrelevant and incompetent was sustained, and the plaintiff excepted. The evidence offered did not go far enough 29 Pac. 497 (track-repairer killed by derailment of car while he was being conveyed to his work); Calvo v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. (1885) 28 S. C. 526, 55 Am. Rep. 28; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnson (1892) 1 Tex. Civ. App. 103, 20 S. W. 1123; Moon v. Richmond & A. R. Co. (1884) 78 Va. 745, 40 Am. Rep. 401; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McKenzie (1885) 81 Va. 71 (night watchman as well as section foreman here held to be vice principal); Bateman v. Peninsular R. Co. (1898) 20 Wash. 133, 54 Pac. 996; Hulehan v. Green Bay, W. & St. P. R. Co. (1887) 68 Wis. 520, 32 N. W. 529 (obstruction).

In the following cases, also, the nondelegable quality of the duty of repairing the track is asserted in perfectly general terms: Illinois C. R. Co. v. Patterson (1873) 69 Ill. 650; Schaub v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1891) 106 Mo. 87, 16 S. W. 924; Wright v. Southern R. Co. (1898) 123 N. C. 280, 31 S. E. 652; Missouri P. R. Co. v. James (1888; Tex.) 10 S. W. 332; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Kirk (1883) 62 Tex. 227; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Dunham (1878) 49 Tex. 181; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Pitts (1897; Tex. Civ. App.) 42 S. W. 255; Torian v. Richmond & A. R. Co. (1887) 84 Va. 192, 4 S. E. 330; McClarnay v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1891) 80 Wis. 277, 49 N. W. 963 (snow was allowed to accumulate, and caused derailment).

An action by a trainman for injuries received from a guy which the railroad company permitted a third person to stretch across the track does not present the question of common employees, since it involves the duty of the employer to provide safe tracks. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. O'Leary (1899) 35 C. C. A. 562, 93 Fed. 737.

Where a defect in the planking over a railroad crossing, by reason of which a brakeman was injured while coupling cars, had existed for so long a time that the company may be presumed to have had notice of it, the fact that the section foreman was furnished with materials, and instructed generally to make repairs when needed, does not relieve the company from the charge of negligence. Fuhrer v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1899) 121 Mich. 212, 80 N. W. 23.

In several of the above cases the abnormal danger. It will be observed, arose from the negligence of the trackmen in leaving temporary obstructions, etc., on the track. But according to one ruling the trackmen themselves are not vice principals in respect to the removal of defects produced by the use of the track,—such as piles of ashes,—and the company should not be held liable unless the conditions have been 64 L. R. A.

brought to the knowledge of some supervising official, like the road master or one of his assistants, and he fails to see that the proper remedy is applied. Anderson v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1895) 107 Mich. 591, 65 N. W. 585 (Grant, J., dissenting). This doctrine, which seems to represent the result of an attempt to compromise between the theory that the duty of repairing is nondelegable and the theory that trainmen and trackmen are not in distinct departments in such a sense that the former do not assume the risk of the latter's negligence is, it is submitted, wholly illogical.

Under the Massachusetts doctrine explained in II. K. supra, it is held that, if a section master is intrusted by a railroad company with the performance of the duty or a part of the duty of supervision of the tracks, which a reasonable regard for the safety of its employees requires the corporation to perform, the company is liable for his negligence. Babcock v. Old Colony R. Co. (1890) 150 Mass. 467, 23 N. E. 325.

2. Dangerous conditions alongside railway tracks.

A railway company is liable to a trainman for injuries due to the obstruction of a track which fell after being allowed to remain an unreasonable time in such a position that, if it fell, it would necessarily endanger the safety of such a servant. That the derrick was originally set up by his fellow servants will not affect this result. Holden v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1880) 129 Mass. 268, 37 Am. Rep. 343.

In Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Echols (1897) 17 Tex. Civ. App. 677, 41 S. W. 488, it was shown that a remnant stack of ties was liable to topple over and fall upon men at work, which rendered the premises unsafe. The court said that "if, by the exercise of such care, its servants and agents, charged with the duty of keeping the premises in a safe condition, knew or would have known of the dangerous condition in which the remnant stack of ties was left in time to have removed the danger, and failed to do so, the company would be liable." The insecurity was deemed to be a merely temporary condition.

The plaintiff was also held entitled to recover in Southern P. R. Co. v. Markey (1892; Tex.) 19 S. W. 392 (brakeman fell over a piece of timber lying near the track); Lewis v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. (1875) 59 Mo. 495, 21 Am. Rep. 385 (excavation left near track); Gates v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1892) 2 S. D. 422, 50 N. W. 907 (no one deputed to see that a derrick near a track was properly secured, when not in use—iron hook, suspended from the arm, to show that there was a standard article in general use for the purpose of preventing trolleys from running off the track when one section of a traveler is removed, and no notice of intent to do so was given. For this reason the objection was properly sustained. If, however, the offer had been broader, it is doubtful whether the evidence would have been admissible under the circumstances of this case. As the automatic device was a new invention, if it had appeared that the accident was caused by an imperfect design, or was owing to a wrong principle of construction, involving a departure from safe methods as commonly applied, evidence to show the existence of a standard article would have been material. According to the evidence, however, the accident was not owing to an inferior design, but to negligence in oiling and cleaning. The failure of the automatic bar to drop was completely accounted for by this neglect. The learned counsel for the plaintiff in his argument before us admitted that the accident was caused by friction resulting from lack of oiling and cleaning. The uncontradicted evidence showed that the device was safe when properly cared for, and hence, even if there was a standard article, the defendants, according to the authorities cited, were not obliged to procure it.

We find no error in the record that requires a reversal, and the judgment appealed from should therefore be affirmed, with costs.

struck plaintiff while standing on a passing car): Missouri P. R. Co. v. Bond (1893) 2 Tex. Civ. App. 104, 20 S. W. 930 (pile of cinders left near the track).

3. Defects in other kinds of tracks.

Recovery was allowed in Gunter v. Graniteville Mfg. Co. (1882) 18 S. C. 262, 44 Am. Rep. 573; Laure v. Graniteville Mfg. Co. (1882) 18 S. C. 275 (tramway on which plaintiff was wheeling bales of cotton collapsed).

4. Defective footpaths.

A railroad company owes its employees the duty, not only to employ suitable persons to keep in repair walks upon which their duties call them, but also to use reasonable diligence to see that they perform their duty. Sweat v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1892) 156 Mass. 284, 81 N. E. 296.

5. Inadequacy of safeguards against dangers from explosive substances.

See also III. o, infra.

In McDonough v. Great Northern R. Co. (1896) 15 Wash. 244, 46 Pac. 334, where the plaintiff was injured by striking his drill against an unexploded charge of dynamite, the court seems to base its decision, both on the general ground that anything which the foreman did in the discharge of his functions as a departmental vice principal was constructively the act of the railway company (see note to O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. [1900; Minn.] 51 L. R. A. pp. 572 et seq.), and also on the special ground that he was intrusted with the particular nonassignable duty of seeing that the place of work was safe. See also Stewart v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. (1889) 28 N. Y. S. R. 215, 8 N. Y. Supp. 19 (explosion of dynamite while being thawed).

6. Inadequacy of protection for servants engaged in excavation work.

See also III. o, infra.

It is only at his own risk that a person engaged in excavating a ditch can depute to another the task of keeping in a safe condition for the servants whom he puts to work in it. Van Steenburgh v. Thornton (1895) 68 N. J. L. 160, 33 Atl. 380 (sewer trench fell in for want of adequate means to shore up the sides properly).

On the ground that the work was particularly dangerous, and the foreman was the only person on the ground who could discharge the duty of supervision, it has been held that the foreman of a gang of twenty-five or thirty men, who has charge of drilling, blasting, and removal of material from a bank of hardpan, and indicates the places where the men under him shall use their shovels, and who hires and discharges men and alone gives orders, is not, as matter of law, a fellow servant with those under him, and as such discharged from any duty of supervising in order to protect them against unnecessary dangers from the fall of loose earth. Hill v. Winston (1898) 73 Minn. 80, 75 N. W. 1030. To the same effect, see Pantzar v. Tilly Foster Iron Min. Co. (1885) 99 N. Y. 368, 2 N. E. 24 (earthslide, danger of which was apparent to official in control); Thompson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1883) 18 Fed. 239 (bank in process of excavation under roadmaster's directions fell in); Eilledge v. National City & O. R. Co. (1893) 100 Cal. 282, 34 Pac. 720 (roadmaster held to be vice principal as regards keeping place of work safe for men blasting rock from a cliff).

7. Inadequacy of protection for servants working in mines.

One employed to timber a drift in a mine so as to provide and keep a safe place for other employees working therein is a vice principal as to them. Grant v. Varney (1895) 21 Colo. 329, 40 Pac. 771; Russell Creek Coal Co. v. Wells (1898) 96 Va. 416, 31 S. E. 614; Consolidated Coal Co. v. Scheiber (1896) 65 Ill. App. 304.

8. Defects in bridges.

The defendant was held liable in Chicago G. W. R. Co. v. Healy (1898) 30 C. C. A. 11, 57 U. S. App. 513, 86 Fed. 245; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Swett (1887) 45 Ill. 197, 92 Am. Dec. 206; Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Conroy (1873) 68 Ill. 560; Bowen v. Chicago, B. & K. C. R. Co. (1888) 95 Mo. 268, 8 S. W. 230; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Daniels (1892) 1 Tex. Civ. App. 695, 20 S. W. 955; San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Adams (1894) 6 Tex. Civ. App. 102, 24 S. W. 839 (roadmaster was negligent). Overruling *Hard v. Vermont & C. R. Cole v. Warren Mfg. Co. (1899) 63 N. J.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

Tinie J. JOSEY, Admx., etc., of F. M. Josey, Deceased.

(.....Ky.....)

1. A section foreman in charge of a crew on a hand car, with power to determine where the car should be stopped, is not, in the act of applying the brakes, a fellow servant of one of the crew, so as to relieve the railroad company from liability for injuries to the latter by his negligent application of the brakes.
2. It is negligence for a section foreman in charge of a crew on a hand car to apply the brakes when the car is running at a high rate of speed, and he sees a member of the crew standing without support, so that suddenly checking the speed of the car will be likely to throw him off from it.

3. Under the Kentucky statutes, gross negligence is not necessary to entitle an administrator to compensatory damages for the negligent killing of his intestate.
4. Objectionable remarks of counsel in arguing to the jury must be preserved by bill of exceptions, to be the subject of review on appeal.

Letellier* (1889) 78 Mich. 492, 44 N. W. 572 (employee repairing docks in a millyard, held a vice principal).

11. Defective method of loading cars.

Contrast cases cited in V. o, 3, infra.

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Seeley (1894) 54 Kan. 21, 37 Pac. 104, it was held that a brakeman on a railway train is not a fellow servant with a station agent intrusted with the duty of loading open cars, and of seeing that such cars are properly inspected and prepared to be put into the train for transportation, by whose negligence in loosely placing smoke-stacks upon such a car the brakeman is knocked off the train and thrown under the wheels of the car. After reviewing the previous rulings of the court in which it had been held that the servants charged with the duty of inspecting the cars themselves were vice principals, the opinion concludes as follows: "We are unable to see any reason for a distinction between the preparation and inspection of the car itself as a fit instrumentality to be placed in a train and the preparation and inspection of a loaded car to be placed in the train for transportation. Each is an instrumentality to be used in connection with the services necessary to be performed by the trainmen in its transportation, and no distinction between them is seen, so far as the obligation of the company or the safety of the employees engaged in handling it are concerned. The inspection in either case is made with reference to the same end, and the person to whom this duty is delegated stands in the place of the company, and the latter is responsible for his acts." To the same effect, see Irvine v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. (1891) 89 Mich. 416, 50 N. W. 1008 (held to be the duty of a railroad company to see that its cars are so loaded that a brakeman will have reasonably safe access to the brakes); Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Farmer (1889) 73 Tex. 85, 11 S. W. 156 (car loaded so that lumber projected over the end); Redington v. New York, O. & S. L. R. A.

W. R. Co. (1895) 84 Hun, 231, 32 N. Y. Supp. 535 (loading a car held to be an act of the employer, where it makes coupling more dangerous than usual, and there are no rules providing for such a case).

12. Pitfalls.

Supp. 800 (servant charged with the duty failed to light a gas jet which was intended solely to give employees a safe means of access to an elevator); Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Brentford (1891) 79 Tex. 619, 15 S. W. 561 (no lights provided for place of work); Sadowski v. Michigan Car Co. (1890) 84 Mich. 100, 47 N. 13. Want of adequate protection against injuries from falling bodies.

Northwestern Fuel Co. v. Danielson (1893) 6 C. C. A. 636, 12 U. S. App. 688, 57 Fed. 916 (fellow servants of a workman held to be the representatives of the employer in removing timbers standing over the head of such workman); Wilson v. Willimantic Linen Co. (1883) 50 Conn. 433, 47 Am. Rep. 653 (employee engaged in setting up machinery injured by a countershaft which fell owing to the negligence of the superintendent or overseer of repairs in a factory); Stephens v. Hudson Valley Knitting Co. (1893) 69 Hun, 375, 23 N. Y. Supp. 656 (injury was caused by the fall of a pile of rolls of cloth); Cavanagh v. O'Neill (1898) 27 App. Div. 48, 50 N. Y. Supp. 207 (employee in a store injured by the fall of a dress form model); Stimper v. Fuchs & L. Mfg. Co. (1898) 26 App. Div. 333, 49 N. Y. Supp. 785 (part of machine, not being properly secured, fell on plaintiff); Blondin v. Oolitic Quarry Co. (1894) 11 Ind. App. 395, 37 N. E. 812 (stone negligently set on edge by one servant fell on another working in the same yard).

In Cole Bros v. Wood (1894) 11 Ind. App. 37, 36 N. E. 1074, it was held (Ross, J., dissenting) that a foreman in a manufacturing shop is a vice principal, and not a fellow servant, of an employee ordered by him to work in a space just large enough for one person to work in safety, with respect to his act in going into such place with another without such employee's knowledge, where one of them comes in contact with and displaces certain tubing causing it to fall and seriously injure such employee. The brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Pirtle & Trabue, with Messrs. Jensen & Wickliffe, for appellant:

At the time of the injury, deceased was not in the service of the company, but he and the foreman, Gayle, and other employees of appellant, were transporting themselves upon a hand car from a section house to some place upon appellant's road where they were to be employed; and the conclusion is inevitable that they were at the time in the relation of fellow servants, being engaged in one common undertaking where there could be no superior or inferior.

772, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914; Gann v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 101 Tenn. 380, 47 S. W. 493.

It was common prudence for Josey and every other man occupying a place on an open hand car, which was upon a down grade and going at the rate of perhaps 8 miles per hour, as is shown in this case to be true, to have held on to the lever bar, and thus have prevented his falling off. His failure to do so was not only not prudent, nor the act of an ordinarily prudent man, but evinced a surprising recklessness and a total disregard for his personal safety.

Mr. Charles Eaves for appellee.

Paynter, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

F. M. Josey was a section hand employed by the appellant, being one of the force of court distinguishes New Pittsburgh Coal & Coke Co. v. Peterson (1894) 136 Ind. 398, 35 N. E. 7, on the ground that the acts there charged, viz., the starting of machinery and the failure to warn the plaintiff, were such as naturally devolve on a fellow servant. The only principle on which this decision can be sustained, if at all, appears to be, that the duty of notifying an employee of any increase of danger in his environment is nonassignable. See III. c, infra.

14. Want of adequate means to keep railway cars stationary when not in use.

Henry v. Wabash Western R. Co. (1891) 109 Mo. 488, 19 S. W. 239 (railway company cannot relieve itself from liability for injuries to a locomotive fireman by a collision with a freight car placed on a side track by delegating to a servant its duty of seeing that it is properly supplied with brakes, and that other means are used to prevent it from being removed by its own weight, or by wind, upon the main tracks).

15. Defective locomotives.

In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Barrett (1897) 166 U. S. 617, 41 L. ed. 1136, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 707, the following instruction was approved: "If the jury believe, from the evidence under the foregoing instructions, that the boiler which exploded and injured the plaintiff was defective and unfit for use, and that defendant's servants, whose duty it was to repair such machinery, knew, or by reasonable care might have known, of such defects in said machinery, then such neglect upon the part of its servants is imputable to the defendant; and if said boiler exploded by reason of said defects, and injured the plaintiff, the defendant would be responsible for the injuries inflicted upon plaintiff, if plaintiff in no way by his own neglect contributed to his injuries."

In Fuller v. Jewett (1880) 80 N. Y. 46, 36 Am. Rep. 575, Affirming s. c. sub nom. Stevenson v. Jewett (1878) 16 Hun, 210, an action against a railroad receiver to recover damages for the killing of a locomotive engineer by the explosion of a boiler, there was evidence that the boiler had been frequently reported and sent to the repair shops for repairs, and the defendant was held not to be excused from liability by the facts that there was no negligence in employing the superintendent of repairs, or in making proper regulations, that the master mechanic in charge gave proper instructions for the repairing, and that the negligence was 64 L. R. A.

Where there is evidence that the engine which caused the injury was out of repair to the knowledge of the defendant's master mechanic, a trial judge is not justified in nonsuiting the plaintiff on the ground that the doctrine of common employment is applicable. The question still remains: Did the master exercise due care to furnish a safe appliance? Kain v. Smith (1881) 25 Hun, 146, Affirmed in (1882) 89 N. Y. 375; Reiterating doctrine of (1880) 80 N. Y. 458, which reversed (1877) 11 Hun, 552.

To the same effect are the following cases, in which the employees in charge of the round-house or other place where repairs of locomotives are executed were held to be vice principals as regards trainmen. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Harper (1884) 44 Ark. 524 (foreman of shops and master mechanic both vice principals in allowing a defective engine to go out on the road); Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Shannon (1867) 43 Ill. 338; Ohio & M. S. R. Co. v. Stein (1894) 140 Ind. 61, 39 N. E. 246; Krueger v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. (1887) 111 Ind. 51, 11 N. E. 957; Cone v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1880) 81 N. Y. 206, 37 Am. Rep. 491, Affirming 15 Hun, 172; Pennsylvania N. Y. Canal & R. Co. v. Mason (1885) 109 Pa. 298, 58 Am. Rep. 722; Brabblits v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1875) 38 Wis. 289.

There is also authority for holding a railway company liable for the failure of an engineer to report that his engine was defective. Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Bingle (1897) 16 Tex. Civ. App. 653, 41 S. W. 90. Writ of error denied in 91 Tex. 287, 42 S. W. 971, Former Appeal (1895) 9 Tex. Civ. App. 322, 29 S. W. 674 (company held to be bound by promise of engineer that repairs would be done); Bridges v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (1879) 6 Mo. App. 389. These decisions would hardly be concurred in by many of the courts which adopt the general principle under discussion. But the imposition of responsibility to the extent here predicated seems to be quite justifiable on logical grounds, if the engineer be regarded as the person who for the time being is in full charge of the piece of machinery operated by him.

16. Defects in railway cars.

That railway companies are responsible for the negligence of employees whose duty it is to keep cars in repair was held in the following cases: Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert (1866) 116 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 755, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 590, Affirming (1882) 3 Dak. 38, 13 which G. W. Gayle was foreman or boss. One of the duties of the section foreman and such of his force as he desired to aid him was to go over the section on certain days to ascertain whether any stock had been killed along the line of the road, and see the condition of the track. To accomplish this it was necessary to go on a hand-car, which the appellant furnished for that purpose. In July, 1898, Gayle took a number of his section men, together with Josey, and started along the line to perform the duty mentioned above. Some of the men rode on the rear end of the car, with their faces in the direction it was moving, and others with their backs in that direction. Among the latter was Josey. The car was moving down grade at a pretty rapid rate of speed, when, as the testimony of appellee conduces to show, foreman Gayle unnecessarily put his foot upon a lever which applied the brakes to the wheels, thus causing the car to suddenly check its speed, throwing Josey in front of it, and it passed over his body, inflicting injuries from which he shortly thereafter died. The testimony introduced by plaintiff conduces to show that the foreman gave no warning of his intention to apply the brakes to stop the car. The defendant sought to show that deceased fell off of the car by reason of his own carelessness and negligence, and thus lost his life, and that the foreman did not apply the brakes until the deceased was in the act of falling off of the car, and it was done in an effort to prevent it from passing over him. The defendant sought to show that the deceased fell off of the car because he did not have hold of the lever which was used in propelling it. The court, in instruc-

Baltimore & P. R. Co. (1890) 8 Mackey, 282 (defective brakes); Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Jackson (1870) 55 Ill. 492, 8 Am. Rep. 661; Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Driscoll (1897) 70 Ill. App. 91; Schaub v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1891) 106 Mo. 87, 18 S. W. 924; McNamara v. Brooklyn City R. Co. (1895) 11 Misc. 667, 32 N. Y. Supp. 913; Missouri P. R. Co. v. James (1888; Tex.) 10 S. W. 832.

In Rodney v. St. Louis S. W. R. Co. (1895) 127 Mo. 676, 23 S. W. 887, 30 S. W. 150, the duty with respect to a car discovered to be defective was discussed as follows: The defendant did not discharge its full duty to the plaintiff by inspecting and marking the car. The duty to furnish reasonably safe appliances and machinery for the use of its servants in the course of their employment was not only an imperative, but a continuous, duty. It ran, so to speak, with the defective car from the moment it was discovered to be defective, continually calling upon the master to repair it, or to warn those of its servants, whom it required in the course of their employment to handle it, of its dangerous character. These duties were not only imperative and continuous, but they were personal duties of the master, to whomsoever delegated, and if neglected by those to whom they were delegated, their negligence was the negligence of the master.

A like principle is controlling where the defective apparatus is a hand-car. Banks v. Wabash Western R. Co. (1890) 40 Mo. App. 458. (Here the delinquent was the foreman of a section crew, and the decision as to such a functionary is perhaps not one which would receive approval in all courts. It must be sustained, if at all, on the same ground as that suggested for the similar decision as locomotive engineer, in the preceding subdivision.)

Unless it is a part of the duty of the trainmen themselves to make the adjustment of the brake-rods of a railway car, an improper adjustment is as much a breach of the nondelegable duty to keep the appliance in safe condition as if some part of it was defective in character or wanting. Woods v. Long Island R. Co. (1899) 159 N. Y. 548, 54 N. E. 1095, Affirming (1896) 11 App. Div. 16, 42 N. Y. Supp. 140.

18. Defective boilers.

See also III. d, 11, supra.

Mitchell v. Robinson (1881) 80 Ind. 281, 41 Am. Rep. 812 (defective boiler exploded).

19. Defective hoisting apparatus.

Corcoran v. Holbrook (1875) 59 N. Y. 517, 17 Am. Rep. 369 (mill-owner was held liable for the negligence of his general agent in omitting to repair a chain by which an elevator was raised and lowered, after he had been notified that the apparatus was in a dangerous condition); Union P. R. Co. v. Fray (1890) 43 Kan. 750, 23 Pac. 1039 (foreman in charge of derrick failed to keep it in safe condition).

In Courtney v. Cornell (1883) 17 Jones & S. 286, the majority of the court held that the owner of a derrick was liable for the negligence of his foreman in beginning work with a derrick, the rigging of which was defective, owing to the fact that the ropes had been stretched by a rain which fell during the night before the accident. Sedgwick dissented on a ground which would probably be now deemed controlling in New York (see VI. infra), vis., that the plaintiff "accepted the risk that would be involved in arranging the derrick and its several attachments, from occasion to occasion."

20. Defective adjustment of the parts of machinery.

Eingartner v. Illinois Steel Co. (1896) 94 Wis. 70, 34 L. R. A. 503, 68 N. W. 664 (oller was injured through the negligence of a carpenter gang, whose duty it was to replace planks about a machine called the "bloom rolls," after their removal for the purpose of attaching new rolls); Monmouth Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Erling (1894) 148 Ill. 521, 36 N. E. 117, Affirming (1892) 45 Ill. App. 411 (employer is not relieved from liability for injuries to an employee caused by the sudden starting of machinery due to the absence of a nut from an eyebolt used to hold a lever in place to keep the machinery stationary, where the nut had been gone for several weeks, by the fact that another employee having charge of the machinery knew of such defect, and did not report it or see that it was repaired).

21. Other defects in machinery.

Fox v. Le Comte (1896) 2 App. Div. 61, 37 N. Y. Supp. 316 (power press so defective that it moved without pressure on the treadle); Carter v. Oliver Oil Co. (1891) 34 S. C. 211, 13 S. E. 419 (servant whose duty it is to repair tions, submitted the questions at issue to the jury, and it could not have found against the appellant except upon the idea that Gayle applied the brakes to the wheels of the car, thus causing a sudden stop, and consequently threw the deceased therefrom, which resulted in the loss of his life.

Counsel for appellant urge in argument that, when a superior is engaged with an inferior servant in performing services ordinarily performed by the latter, he becomes a fellow servant, and the master is not liable for his negligence; that the same person may in some things be a superior, and in others a fellow servant, and in the latter event the master is not liable for injuries caused by his negligence. If the principle contended for by counsel is conceded to be correct, still it has no application to this case. The section foreman, Gayle, directed the movements of his force. He determined when the car should be placed upon the track and the place where it should be stopped. His duty placed him on the car, where he was when this accident occurred; and, furthermore, it was his duty to manage and control the brakes. He was not performing the duty of one of the section men in manipulating the brakes on the car, thus controlling its movements, but was performing the duty imposed upon him by reason of the fact that he was foreman of the crew, directing and controlling their movements, as well as the car. He controlled the brakes on that car as an engineer upon a locomotive engine does the air brakes upon a train. While it is not done by steam, as in the former case, he supplied the force which applied the brakes to the wheels of the car. When a fireman is present performing his sacks which are dangerous to use when torn held to be a vice principal as regards another servant, who handles them in operating a machine); Swift & Co. v. Short (1899) 34 C. C. A. 545, 92 Fed. 567 (act of a fellow servant of a person injured by the flying of a shoe forming part of a clutch from a rapidly revolving wheel, in wiring the shoe to make it safe after it is cracked, held to be the act of the master); Jaques v. Great Falls Mfg. Co. (1891) 86 N. H. 482, 13 L. R. A. 324, 22 Atl. 562 (employee liable for an injury received by a weaver in consequence of the unskilful manner in which the loom had been repaired by the mechanic to whom the duty of repairing had been assigned).

An injury received by one servant through the failure of another servant to keep the brake of a hoisting apparatus in repair would be regarded as due to the negligence of a vice principal. But if the injury is received by the negligence of the second servant in releasing the brake, while taking an active part in the working of the apparatus, the negligence is that of a mere fellow servant. Fox v. Spring Lake Iron Co. (1891) 89 Mich. 387, 50 N. W. 872.

Co.* (1895) 12 Utah, 30, 41 Pac. 551 (employee charged with the direction of work in the absence of a foreman, and with the duty of repairing machinery when needed, not a fellow servant of another employee so far as his duty to make repairs is concerned); Mackey v. Baltimore & P. E. Co. (1890) 8 Mackey, 282.

The breach of the duty to keep an instrumentality in safe condition may obviously be committed, not only by failing to repair it, but by removing from it some essential part, the want of which renders it dangerous in use. Browning v. Wabash Western R. Co. (1894) 124 Mo. 55, 24 S. W. 731, affirmed in 27 S. W. 644 (engineer killed owing to the removal of brakestaffs by a roadmaster).

It should be observed that as soon as the superior employee, who is responsible for the repairs, has given orders to have them executed, any servant who knows of the dangerous condition, and goes to work of his own motion before the repairs are completed, does so at his own risk. Schuls v. Roke (1896) 149 N. Y. 132, 43 N. E. 420, reversing (1894) 8 Misc. 683, 28 N. Y. Supp. 1147. The explanation of the case in Galasso v. National S. S. Co. (1898) 27 App. Div. 169, 50 N. Y. Supp. 417, seems to be based on a misapprehension as to its actual scope.

e. Difference between the extent of a master's responsibility for original supply and subsequent maintenance.

In a recent note the discussion of the question whether general managers are vice principals necessitated an examination of the decisions which are based upon the theory that the duty of original supply is absolute and personal, while the duty of maintenance is delegable. See note to O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900) (Minn.) 51 L. R. A. pp. 564 et seq. But it will not be out of place to quote here a few judicial statements which, as bringing out clearly the antagonism between this theory and the one explained in the last section, are pertinent for the purposes of the present investigation. That the opposing theories like so many others which produce a conflict in this branch of law, rest upon premises which imply essentially irreconcilable views as to the extent of the obligations which should be imposed upon the master, is clearly shown by the extracts from the two Vermont cases following.

In Hard v. Vermont & C. R. Co. (1860) 32 Vt. 473, the court, in discussing the contention of defendant's counsel, said: "It is insisted that there is an implied warranty on the part of the principal of the soundness of the machinery duties on the engine by supplying it with fuel, thus generating the steam which propels the engine, and makes it possible for the engineer to control the movement of the train by applying the brakes, the relation of fellow servant does not exist between them, and, if the engineer should negligently apply the brakes, and cause the train to give a sudden movement, throwing the fireman from the engine, certainly no one would contend that the master was not responsible for the negligent act of the engineer. In such case he is not the fellow servant of the fireman; neither was the foreman of the section crew the fellow servant of the deceased.

Counsel for appellant cite the case of Gann v. Nashville, O. & St. L. R. Co. 101 Tenn. 380, 47 S. W. 493, in support of their position. That is a case of the Tennessee supreme court, which recognizes that the foreman of a section crew is not the fellow servant of the section men. The facts of that case were substantially the same as in this case, and the court there held that, although the foreman was not the fellow servant of the section men, still, as he was performing a service ordinarily performed by section men, he became a fellow servant. The facts of that case show that it was the duty of the foreman to manipulate the brakes of the hand car, and control its movements, as well as direct the men in charge of it. We fail to understand, in view of those facts, how the court concluded that the section foreman was performing a service ordinarily performed by one of the inferior servants. Under the facts of that case the court, in our opinion erroneously, reached the conclusion that the foreman which he puts into the hands of his servants, so far as any unsoundness therein may be discovered by the exercise of proper care and diligence.' This rule is undoubtedly correct, as we have already seen, and as is shown by the authorities cited in support of it. But this is true only of the state and condition of the machinery at the time it is put into the hands of the servant. The principal does not warrant that the servants shall faithfully discharge their duty in keeping the machinery in its original safe condition. To establish this principle would be to abrogate the rule and make the principal the warrantor of the faithfulness of all the servants."

In Davis v. Central Vermont R. Co. (1882) 55 Vt. 84, 45 Am. Rep. 590, the court remarked that, when the above decision was rendered "the liability of the master was held to be dependent upon whether the servant whose negligence caused the injury and the servant injured were fellow servants in a common employment or work," and proceeded thus: "Making this the test for determining the master's liability, and the reasoning and conclusions of the late Chief Justice Pierpont are unanswerable. But this test, while determinative in a great number of cases, as we have seen, has been abandoned both in England and in this country, and in lieu thereof the master's liability has been made to rest upon whether the negligence arose in the performance of a duty for the careful discharge of which he became responsible when he assumed the relation of master to the injured servant. On the principles which we think furnish the true ground upon which the master's liability rests, and on the American application of them, the charge of the county court in the particulars to which exceptions were taken contains no error. The American doctrine holding the master liable for the negligence of his servant while discharging a duty which the master owes to a general workman is more consonant with reason and the general safety of the traveling public than the English doctrine announced in Wilson v. Merry (1868) 1 L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 80."

In Howd v. Mississippi C. R. Co. (1874) 50 Miss. 178, the court said: "A railroad company is bound, in the original construction of its road and appurtenances, to make it reasonably secure for the safe transportation of trains upon it, and also to keep the track in repair. In order to discharge the latter duty the corporation must employ suitable persons, and supply them with needful material to make repairs; and should also, through its agent or agents, have a supervision over the road. In order to hold the company responsible to an employee (as a conductor on its train) for injuries sustained because of the road or its appurtenances being out of repair, it must be shown that the company is in default in its duty, either by the selection of incompetent servants or an insufficient number to do the work, or failure to furnish proper material, or that the company had notice of the bad condition of the road, or is chargeable with negligence for not knowing. The corporation will have done all that could be reasonably required of it, when it exercised circumspection and prudence in appointing employees to observe the road, make the repairs, and when it put at their disposal suitable material for the work; and when it caused suitable supervision to be had over these."

In Wilson v. Merry (1868) 1 L. R. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, Lord Colonsay said: "I think that there are duties incumbent on masters with reference to the safety of laborers in mines and factories, on the fulfillment of which the laborers are entitled to rely, and for the failure in which the master may be responsible." But he concurred in the actual decision of the House.

f. Duty to see that worn-out or otherwise defective parts of instrumentalities are replaced by suitable substitutes.

The quality of the duty may be said to depend upon the essential nature of the operation by which the replacement is effected in each particular case. In some cases that operation is, logically speaking, equivalent to a discharge of the function of supplying a suitable instrumentality. Under such circumstances the liability of the master for the negligence of an employee to whom that function is deputed cannot be consistently denied by any court which concedes the duty of supply to be nondelegable. For the purposes of this principle it is plainly immaterial whether the substitution is that of an entire instrumentality, or merely one of its constituent parts. Lehigh Valley Coal Co. v. Warrek (1898) 28 C. A. 540, 55 U. S. App. 437, 84 Fed. 866 (blocks furnished for checking the speed of coal cars were defective to the knowledge of the superintendent); Mulvey v. Rhode Island Locomotive Works (1883) 14 R. I. 204 (superintendent had notice that an elevator chain was defective, but failed to furnish a new one).

A machine may be so constructed, and its operation may be such, as to call for a frequent replacement of one or more of its constituent parts. Such parts when adjusted in the machine become as much a part of it as if included was performing a service ordinarily performed by a fellow servant. In that as in this case he was performing a duty which was imposed upon him by reason of the fact that he had charge of the force and of the hand car, the brakes of which it was his peculiar duty to manipulate. In the case of Illinois C. R. Co. v. Coleman, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 878, 59 S. W. 13, this court held that a yard master was not a fellow servant of one of the servants employed in the yard when he was assisting that servant in the manipulation of car couplings.

It is urged that the deceased was negligent in not supporting himself by holding to the lever on the car while it was traveling at the rate of speed it was when the accident happened. The testimony offered by the defendant tends to show that he was not thus supporting himself. In our opinion, instead of that testimony aiding the defendant, it had the contrary effect. If he was standing upon the hand car without any support, then the greater reason why the section foreman should not have applied the brakes to the car so as to suddenly check its speed. The foreman could see his position, and must have known the peril in which he would be placed if the car was suddenly checked. According to the testimony of all the witnesses in this case, there was no occasion for stopping the car at the place where the accident happened. The appellant did not endeavor to show that it was necessary to apply the brakes at that place, except in an effort to protect the deceased when he was discovered falling from the car.

The instructions which the court gave the jury were more favorable to the defendant than it was entitled to receive. Under them in the original construction, and a defect in one of them is a defect in the machine. The duty of seeing that such parts are not defective is one incumbent on the master. It is not a matter of ordinary repair from day to day, which may be intrusted to a servant. The defendant could not, therefore, avoid responsibility by delegating this duty to persons whom it believed to be competent, and who in fact were competent to perform it. If the injury to the plaintiff was due to a defect in the punch, which might have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable care on their part, but was not, the defendant is liable for their negligence. Foy v. United States Cartridge Co. (1893) 159 Mass. 313, 34 N. E. 461. See also the quotation from the opinion in Moynihan v. Hill Co. (1888) 146 Mass. 586, 16 N. E. 574, as given in VII. b. infra.

Upon general principles, it would seem that that species of replacement which would be incident to the preparation of instrumentalities as part of the work, or to any of the other operations discussed in VI. infra, would not constitute the exercise of a nondelegable function; but no case is known to the writer in which this precise point has been considered.

The control of the repairs is deemed to be rather with those who are to provide the apparatus than with those who are to work with it, where the means of replacing defective parts are not supplied to the person in charge of it until he asks for what is needed. Daley v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1888) 147 Mass. 101, 16 N. E. 690.

In other cases the operation of replacement is associated with the function of maintenance, in that substitution represents the most appropriate, as possibly the only available, method by which a defective instrumentality can be prevented from falling below the legal standard of safety. So far, therefore, as the doctrine that this function is one pertaining to the absolute obligations of the master is not limited by the principle explained in V. j., and VII., infra, it is clear that the master must answer for the negligence of all employees whose duty it is to see that the instrumentalities or their parts are renewed, whenever this is the course which a prudent man would adopt under the circumstances. See, for example, Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Dunham (1878) 49 Tex. 181 (railroad company held liable for an injury to a brakeman resulting from failure of the roadmaster and section men to replace rotten ties with sound ones).

g. Duty to furnish proper medical treatment to sick or injured servants.

negligence of the captain of a ship in failing to follow the advice of a physician as to the proper treatment of a member of the crew who is injured in the course of his employment. Scarff v. Metcalf (1887) 107 N. Y. 211, 13 N. E. 796.

h. Duty to hire suitable servants.

In the nature of the case this duty must be regarded as one which, for the purpose of practical litigation, has relation solely to original supply or replacement. The maintenance of a human being in a condition of efficiency is not a function which can be viewed as the subject-matter of an obligation in the same sense as that which is contemplated by the law where unintelligent agencies of work are concerned. To make out a certain parallelism between the two cases would doubtless be possible, but the analogies evolved by such an investigation would be of merely scholastic interest. For example, it may fairly enough be maintained that a master who, instead of resorting to the customary remedies of dismissal, suspension, or change of work, where a servant has become so incapable, through bodily or mental infirmities, as to endanger the safety of his collaborators, retains him in the same employment, is subject to the duty of seeing that everything is done that can reasonably be done under the circumstances to bring him back to health and vigor by appropriate treatment. But the writer is not aware that the enforcement of such a duty has ever been discussed. The obligation of the master to provide medical treatment for a sick or injured servant has never been viewed as one creating legal rights in favor of co-servants. The only absolute obligation, therefore, to which it is necessary to advert in the present connection is that of "exercising proper diligence in the employment of reasonably safe and competent men to perform their respective duties." Northern P. R. Co. v. Peterson (1896) 162 U. S. 346, 40 L. ed. 994, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 843.

There is complete unanimity as to the doctrine that the negligence of one who represents the employer in hiring and discharging men is chargeable to the employer. Oleson v. Andrews (1897) 168 Mass. 261, 47 N. E. 90; Bosworth v. Rogers (1897) 27 C. C. A. 385, 53 U. S. App. 620, 82 Fed. 975; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Hawthorne (1896) 19 C. C. A. 623, 43 U. S. App. 113, 73 Fed. 634; Walker v. Bolling (1853) 22 Ala. 294; Tyson v. South & North Ala. R. Co. (1878) 61 Ala. 554, 32 Am. Rep. 8; Matthews v. Bull (1897; Cal.) 47 Pac. 773; Murphy v. Hughes (1898) 1 Penn. (Del.) 250, 40 Atl. 187; Justice v. Pennsylvania Co. (1892) 130 Ind. 321, 30 N. E. 303; Quincy Min. Co. v. Kitts the plaintiff could only recover compensatory damages by showing gross negligence. The administratrix was entitled to compensatory damages if the death resulted from negligence, and to punitive damages if it was the result of gross negligence. Section 6, chap. 1, Ky. Stat. There are many decisions of this court to that effect. It is only by virtue of the Constitution and the statute that there can be a recovery of damages for the loss of life occasioned by negligence. If the accident had not resulted in Josey's death, and he had sustained injuries thereby, he could have maintained his action by showing that it was the result of gross negligence. This peculiar condition of the law results from the facts that the right of action for the loss of life is given by the Constitution and statute, and the other right to recover for injuries exists at common law.

Counsel urge that the case should be reversed because of objectionable argument or language employed by counsel for appellee on the argument of the case before the jury. The bill of exceptions does not even show what counsel said in arguing the case before the jury; hence there is nothing for the court to consider in respect to that matter.

The judgment is affirmed.

R. Co. (1871) 47 Mo. 567, 4 Am. Rep. 353; Mann v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1883) 91 N. Y. 495 (conductor put a man on the list of extra brakemen, without any inquiry as to his qualifications, or instructing him as to the rules of the company); O'Laughlin v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1887) 27 N. Y. Week. Dig. 109, 9 N. Y. S. R. 384, Affirmed in (1889) 113 N. Y. 623, 20 N. E. 876; Sullivan v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1900) 58 App. Div. 89, 65 N. Y. Supp. 842 (special point raised was that the delinquent went beyond the scope of his proper duties); Frazier v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1860) 38 Pa. 104, 80 Am. Dec. 467; Texas Mexican R. Co. v. Whitmore (1888) 58 Tex. 276 (foreman of bridge gang knew that engineer of pile driver was incompetent).

The New York cases cited above are in accord with the decision of the supreme court in Wright v. New York C. R. Co. (1858) 28 Barb. 80, which was not explicitly concurred in as to this point by the court of appeals, where it was observed ([1862] 25 N. Y. 562) that the responsibility of the master was a debatable question on the evidence that there was declared to be at all events no negligence as regards the selection of the delinquent servant. These decisions may be regarded as having discredited Kidwell v. Houston & G. N. R. Co. (1877) 8 Woods, 313, Fed. Cas. No. 7,757, where, in discussing a contention of plaintiff's counsel that the averment in the petition, charging that the "master mechanic was advised of the habitual negligence and general bad habits of said car inspector, and that he failed and refused to discharge him," takes this case out of the general rule, as being equivalent to a charge that the company had employed an unskilful or incompetent car inspector, the court said: "The charge, thus vaguely made, seems to me only to amount to a charge of negligence on the part of the master mechanic in not reporting the character of the car inspector to the officers of the company, and does not, therefore, constitute an exception to the general rule that a railroad company is not liable to one of its employees for the mere negligence of another employee. It does not appear that the master machinist was anything more than a fellow servant of the car inspector and the plaintiff, without the power of appointment or removal. Under these circumstances the defendant company could not be made liable."

A complaint framed on the theory of negligence in retaining an incompetent servant need not contain a specific averment that he had authority, by virtue of his employment, to do the act which produced the injury. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Pierce (1894) 7 Tex. Civ. App. 597, 25 S. W. 1052. The acceptance of this doctrine 54 L. R. A.

involves the consequence that it is quite immaterial whether the negligent person was a partner or an employee of the defendant, since the servant must succeed on either theory. McMahon v. Davidson (1867) 12 Minn. 357, Gil. 232.

Negligence which consists in transferring persons already in the service from duties which they are competent to perform to duties for which they are unfitted is deemed to be a breach of the personal obligation now under review. In such a case the inference of liability follows immediately upon proof that the official who made the transfer was acting within the scope of his powers. Blackman v. Thomson-Houston Electric Co. (1897) 102 Ga. 64, 29 S. E. 120; Harper v. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1871) 47 Mo. 567, 4 Am. Rep. 353 (engineer viewed as a vice principal in permitting a fireman to run his engine); Lytle v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. (1890) 84 Mich. 289, 47 N. W. 571 (promise of yardmaster that a fireman should not run an engine held to be binding on a railway company. In this doctrine, which was adopted at a very early stage in the development of the law of employers' liability, we find the first recognition of the fact that there is a logical inconsistency involved in declaring a master to be subject to an absolute duty and yet not responsible for the negligence of the person to whom that duty has been delegated. See the opinion of Shaw, Ch. J., in Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp. (1842) 4 Met. 49, 38 Am. Dec. 339.

That the principle to which this fact points was applied to the duty of hiring suitable servants several years before the courts advanced to the conception of a generalization on the same lines, with respect to the entire class of absolute duties, seems to have been a result of the prominence which, from the very outset, was given to the conception that the doctrine of common employment is subject to the qualification that the servant, "when he engages to run the risks of his service, including those arising from the negligence of fellow servants, has a right to understand that the master has taken reasonable care to protect him from such risks by associating him only with persons of ordinary skill and care." Hutchinson v. York, N. & B. R. Co. (1850) 5 Exch. 343, 19 L. J. Exch. N. S. 296, 14 Jur. 837, per Alderson, B. See note to Smith v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (1889; Mo.) 48 L. R. A. 369.

The connection between the doctrine in its positive form and as a mere qualification of the doctrine of common employment is well shown in Walker v. Bolling (1853) 22 Ala. 294. There Phelan, J. (p. 314), after stating the two doctrines established by the earlier cases to be that the master is bound to use ordinary care in providing competent servants, and that the servant impliedly stipulates to run the ordinary risks of the service, among which are to be con-

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

Thomas F. TEDFORD, Respt.,
v.
LOS ANGELES ELECTRIC COMPANY,
Appt.

(.....Cal.....)

1. It is the duty of an electric company to warn of the danger an employee who is hired to dig holes, repair poles, and to do other work on the ground, and who to its knowledge is unacquainted with the dangerous character of the work of a lineman, upon ordering him to ascend a pole and scrape a wire, and it cannot relieve itself from liability for injuries caused by noncompliance with such duty by delegating its performance to a foreman who is in a general sense a fellow servant of the person injured.

2. A verdict for $15,000 in favor of an employee of an electric company, who was badly injured by falling from a pole on account of contact with a live wire, for which the company was responsible, will not be set aside by the appellate court as excessive.

considered acts of negligence on the part of a fellow servant, proceeded thus: "But the master does not discharge this duty, or, in other words does not use due care, when he exposes the servant to danger by associating with him in a service of peril those who are wanting in ordinary skill and prudence; and if the master chooses to do this, or his agent does it, the former will be held accountable and it is no excuse for him to say, 'I delegated a duty arising from the relation I occupy to a third person, who was in all respects competent to discharge it, and his neglect was one of the risks which the servant took.' The answer would be, that the agent must be regarded as the master, and not as the servant, so far as this duty was concerned. In the present case the evidence shows gross negligence, and a criminal inattention to his duties, on the part of the engineer. It was the duty of the captain to protect the subordinate agents, employed in the common business, from the probable consequences of such neglect by the prompt discharge of the person who, by his carelessness and recklessness, was endangering the lives of all on board; and this duty, as we have already said, devolved upon him, not as the servant, but as the master, as the representative of the owner. This duty he did not discharge: and for the injurious consequences of this neglect the owner is responsible. . . . But an important inquiry meets us here, not embraced by these principles, and which we do not find to be covered by any of the adjudicated cases. It is this: When there is a general manager or superintendent of the service, with inferior agents or servants, or classes of agents or servants, under him, and such general manager or superintendent is invested by the common employer with the duty and authority of employing and dismissing those who are under him, are acts of negligence on the part of such general manager to be considered as falling within the ordinary risks of the service, for which the common employer is not responsible? And again: even if other acts of negligence will be so regarded, are we so likewise to regard his acts of negligence in not exercising reasonable care and diligence in not employing competent inferior officers and servants, or in not dismissing such as prove incompetent? In regard to all other acts of negligence on the part of the general manager or superintendent, I decline to express an opinion until the case arises. But with respect to the last-mentioned kind of negligence, namely: that of failing to exercise reasonable care in procuring competent inferior officers and agents, where that falls within the scope of his duty, or in dismissing such as prove to be incompetent,—I must hold that they cannot be included among the risks for which the master or common employer shall not be held responsible. To hold otherwise would be, as I maintain, to destroy the valuable general principle recognised and established in the very 54 L. R. A.

cases which have been quoted, in which it is held to be the duty of every master or principal to provide men of ordinary care and skill for each particular station, for the safety and protection, not only of strangers, but of those engaged in his service. This duty of the master is expressly retained in the very cases where he is held not to be subject further than this for injuries which may result to one servant from the acts of negligence of his fellow servant. Whether the master will do this or not is no part of the ordinary risks of the service; he is strictly held to the performance of it at all times. . . . It follows, also, that the law will not allow any shift by which that may be done indirectly which cannot be done directly; in other words, the law will not allow a master, whose duty it is to employ none but men of ordinary care and skill, in all branches of the service, to devolve the duty of making such employment on his general manager, who may be irresponsible, and by such means become irresponsible himself, for a neglect of this important duty. As to that much, the general manager must, upon principle, be held to be the agent of the master, not only to the world at large, but to his inferior officers and servants; and his neglects in this regard will be the neglects of the common employer even as to them. If he employs or retains incompetent subordinates, the master will be responsible for such an act of negligence on the part of his general manager, even to a person engaged in the same service with the general manager." See also the comments on this case in Tyson v. South & North Ala. R. Co. (1878) 61 Ala. 554, 32 Am. Rep. 8.

1. Duty to employ servants sufficient in number for the work in hand.

An absolute duty which, logically speaking, may be connected with the hiring of competent servants or the institution and maintenance of a safe system, is the duty of seeing that the number of persons employed is sufficient to prevent each of them from being exposed to that class of risks which results from an inadequacy of the force available for the work in hand. In Flike v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1873) 53 N. Y. 549, 13 Am. Rep. 545, the leading case on this doctrine, it was contended by counsel for defendant, (1) that the company was not liable, because the agent had, in fact, employed a third brakeman to go upon this train, who, by reason of oversleeping, failed to get aboard in time, and hence, that the injury must be attributed to his negligence, and (2) that such negligence, if attributable to the general agent in not supplying his place with another man, must be regarded as committed while acting in the capacity of a mere coservant. But the court said: "Neither of these positions is tenable. The hiring of a third brakeman was only one of the APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gibbon & Halsted and W. A. Cheney for appellant.

Messrs. Henry T. Gage and W. L. Foley, for respondent:

Respondent was inexperienced. Appellant owed him the personal duty of warning and instructing him about the dangers connected with the transformer or converter. Appellant's delegation of the performance of this duty to Burge did not shift its liability to respondent because of Burge's failure to warn and instruct. His failure to warn and instruct respondent of the danger from the converter and wires at the time of the accident was the failure of appellant to perform a personal duty, and it is liable for negligence.

A. 597, 59 Pac. 579; Higgins v. Williams, 114 Cal. 182, 45 Pac. 1041.

The duty of appellant to warn and in-steps proper to be taken to discharge the principal's duty, which was to supply with sufficient help and machinery, and properly despatch, the train in question, and this duty remained to be performed although the hired brakeman failed to wake up in time, or was sick, or failed to appear for any other reason. It was negligent for the company to start the train without sufficient help. The acts of Rockefeller [the head conductor] cannot be divided up, and a part of them regarded as those of the company, and the other part as those of a coservant merely, for the obvious reason that all his acts constituted but a single duty. His acts are indivisible, and the attempt to create a distinction in their character would involve a refinement in favor of corporate immunity not warranted by reason or authority. As well might the company be relieved if the train was started without an engineer, or without brakes or with a defective engine. The same duty rested upon the company, though every man employed had died or run away during the night, and if negligent in discharging it, either by acts of commission or omission, whether in employing improper help, or not enough of it, or in not requiring their presence upon the train, it is, upon every just principle, responsible for the consequences. Nor is the company relieved, although negligence may be imputed to the defaulting brakeman. The only effect of that circumstance would be to make the negligence contributory with the brakeman, but would not affect the liability of the company." This case was followed in Booth v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1878) 73 N. Y. 38, 29 Am. Rep. 97 (involving similar facts); Heiner v. Heuvelman (1879) 13 Jones & S. 88. See also, to the same effect, Boden v. Demwolf (1893) 56 Fed. 846; Cheney v. Ocean S. S. Co. (1893) 92 Ga. 726, 19 S. E. 33. On the authority of this last case it has been held that an employer does not discharge his full duty in keeping a place reasonably safe by giving warnings of threatened or impending danger when the employee charged with the duty of giving the warnings is so engrossed and busy with his other duties that he cannot properly and efficiently give the necessary warnings. The Pioneer (1897) 78 Fed. 600.

Where no employee at all has been assigned for the performance of a duty connected with the operation of machinery the master cannot take advantage of the rule that the neglect of an employee who is furnished with the means and conveniences for keeping machinery in proper condition for safe operation, and charged with that duty, is not chargeable to the master in case of an injury to another employee. Prescott v. J. Ottman Lithographing Co. (1897) 20 54 L. R. A.

j. Duty to frame rules and regulations for the conduct of the business.

All the American courts are agreed that the duty of framing such general rules and regulations as a prudent man would, under the circumstances, see to be necessary for the elimination of dangers of certain classes, belongs to the category of those which the master cannot, except at his peril, assign to a servant. Northern P. R. Co. v. Peterson (1896) 162 U. S. 346, 40 L. ed. 994, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 843; Dana v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1883) 92 N. Y. 639; Sheehan v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1883) 91 N. Y. 332; Slater v. Jewett (1881) 85 N. Y. 61, 39 Am. Rep. 627; Ford v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1891) 124 N. Y. 493, 12 L. R. A. 454, 28 N. E. 1101; Bosworth v. Rogers (1897) 27 C. C. A. 385, 53 U. S. App. 620, 82 Fed. 975; and the cases cited below.

The earliest suggestion of the doctrine seems to be that reported in Little Miami R. Co. v. Stevens (1851) 20 Ohio, 415, where the Ohio doctrine as to superior servants was laid down. Chief Justice Hitchcock thought that, on the facts, the case might be decided in the same way without running counter to Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 4 Met. 49, 38 Am. Dec. 339, and others of a like character. He considered that the negligence was really that of the company itself, or its immediate agent, the superintendent, in omitting to see that the engineers and conductors of both trains had the same time cards.

Apparently the same principle is accepted in England, though the specific authority on this point is less unequivocal than that for the non-delegable quality of the duty of supplying safe instrumentalities.

In Smith v. Baker (1891) A. C. 325, 353, 60 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 683, 65 L. T. N. S. 467, 55 J. P. 660, Lord Watson laid it down that the master is "no less responsible to his workmen for personal injuries occasioned by a defective system of using machinery than for injuries caused by a defect in the machinery itself." This remark was made in a case tried after the passage of the employers' liability act. But the authorities cited were the statements made by Lord Chelmsford in Bartonshill Coal Co. v. McGuire (1858) 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 310, 4 Jur. N. S. 773, and by Lord Wenleydale in Weems v. Mathleson (1861) 4 Macq. H. L. Cas. 226, both decided under common-law principles. See struct respondent because of his inexperience and the hazardous nature of the business in which he was employed was personal to it, and, although it delegated its performance to Burge, its personal duty did not shift from it because of Burge's failure to warn and instruct.

It is the duty of the master to supervise, direct, and control the operation and management of his business so that no injury shall ensue to his employees through his own carelessness or negligence in carrying it on, or else to furnish some person who will do so, for whom he must stand sponsor. Hunn v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1889) 78 Mich. 513, 7 L. R. A. 500, 44 N. W. 602.

If, therefore, he chooses to leave to an employee the regulation of matters which he ought to have provided for by specific rules, such employee will be regarded as his representative. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Fox (1884) 31 Kan. 586, 3 Pac. 320 (car repairer held entitled to maintain an action, where the company had made no rules, and furnished no flags as signals, and left everything which concerned the work to the management of the foreman); *Pool v. W. 870 (employee not, as matter of law, free from liability where the injury was due to a lack of proper precautions, though the immediate cause of the accident was his obedience to the order of his foreman, a fellow servant, in directing him to work without seeing that he was protected in some way); Bedington v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. (1895) 84 Hun, 231, 32 N. Y. Supp. 535 (no rules provided for the loading of cars in such a manner as to prevent unnecessary danger to servants coupling them).

In Tully v. New York & T. S. S. Co. (1896) 10 App. Div. 463, 42 N. Y. Supp. 29, the plaintiff, owing to there being no light between the decks of a ship, fell into an uncovered hatchway, and it was contended, in behalf of the defendant, that, as it had provided sufficient lamps for the use of employees, the want of light was attributable, not to its negligence, but to theirs. But the court said: "There is evidence tending to prove that, when a vessel arrives at the dock, men appearing about there are employed to take off the cargo and to reload it with freight, and that they may have had no experience in the work they are called upon to perform in that service. They, unadvised, may not know of the facilities which can be afforded them when circumstances render their use and application desirable for safety. Conditions like that which caused the failure of the plaintiff to avoid the danger which he encountered, it may be assumed, are liable to arise and be produced in like manner. It would therefore seem to be reasonably incumbent upon the defendant to have some system by way of rules or regulations. The availability of protective means and appliances to the workmen is not necessarily of any benefit to them unless they are advised of it. It may be that, if the defendant had provided rules which required those in charge of the work to advise the workmen of the precautionary means of protection which could be had, the plaintiff's misfortune might not have occurred. . . . It does not appear that the defendant had, by any rules or regulations whatever, required or directed the agents to advise workmen temporarily employed to work upon the steamships, in loading and unloading, of any precautionary means which it might, for their safety, be or become desirable to use. For this reason we think that the question whether the defendant was chargeable with negligence was for the jury."

In Bushby v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1887) 107 N. Y. 374, 14 N. E. 407, where the plaintiff was injured through the defective loading of a railroad car, the defendant relied upon its "system," which was to let the shipper load and stake, while, as to inspection, its evidence only tended to show that if, in the general performance of the duties of their employment, the station agent found anything out of the way, he should correct it, or if the conductor or brakeman saw a defect, he should report it to the station master. No special duty was imposed on either in regard to inspection, nor direction given as to its manner. The court said: "The . . . proposition of the defendant is, that 'it is not necessary in this case to decide whether the stakes in question were or were not appliances or machinery within the meaning of the rule invoked by the supreme court at the general term' . . . 'for the reason that the system under which they were furnished, inspected, and employed was perfectly well known to the plaintiff, and he took the risks of the consequences of that system.' There was no system as to this matter. If the evidence shows that such practices had obtained before, it merely shows that the defendant chose to delegate a duty to the shipper which the corporation should have performed. It is equally responsible for his negligence; his negligence is its negligence."

So, also, if the servants whose acts caused

Respondent was ordered by Burge to a post of danger under the assurance that the same was safe. While working at that post, in obedience to the rules of appellant, the risk was increased without respondent's knowledge and without his fault. Burge failed to perform appellant's personal duty of warning respondent of the new danger, and the failure resulted in his injury. Burge, in so far as he failed to perform this personal duty, was not a fellow servant, but a vice principal and appellant's alter ego, and appellant became liable for his acts and omissions.

the injury were "acting without any known rule or regulation, and simply following a dangerous practice sanctioned by time and custom, the result might be imputed to the neglect of the defendant in omitting to change the method of doing the work and adopting a safer one." Doling v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. (1897) 151 N. Y. 579, 45 N. E. 1028.

This is the rationale of the decision in Sword v. Cameron (1889) 1 Dunlop, B. & M. Sc. Sess. Cas. 493, where the master was held to be liable to a quarryman who was injured by the firing of a blast before he had time to reach a place of shelter, the evidence being that the shot was fired in accordance with the usual and inveterate practice of the quarry. This case was cited in Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid (1858) 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 266, 4 Jur. N. S. 787, in support of the proposition that the doctrine of common employment was unknown to the law of Scotland, but Lord Cranworth pointed out that the decision did not turn upon the negligence of the fellow workmen who fired the shot, and expressly stated that it was justifiable, on the ground that "the injury was evidently the result of a defective system not adequately protecting the workmen at the time of the explosions." A similar construction was put upon the case by Lord Chelmsford in Bartonshill Coal Co. v. McGuire (1858) 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 310, 4 Jur. N. S. 773.

A servant who, acting upon the authority conferred on him, has made a rule which is reasonably necessary for the protection of his subordinates, is, of course, a representative of the master in regard to the suspension or abrogation of that rule. Richmond Granite Co. v. Bailey (1896) 92 Va. 554, 24 S. E. 232.

k. Duty to bring regulations to the knowledge of employees.

The duty of framing suitable rules being certainly nonassignable, it would seem to be a necessary inference that the subsidiary duty of publication, without the performance of which the framing would be an idle formality, must also be nonassignable. The authorities upon the subject, however, are very meagre, and, such as they are, conflicting. On the one hand, it is held that a section foreman on whom is devolved the duty of informing his hands of a rule that extra trains may be expected at any time without notice, is pro hac vice the representative of the company. Olson v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1888) 38 Minn. 117, 35 N. W. 866. Compare the argument of the court in Tully v. New York & T. S. S. Co. (1896) 10 App. Div. 463, 42 N. Y. Supp. 29, as quoted in the 54 L. R. A.

Where a servant is transferred to new duties, and the risks are more hazardous than he has a right to expect, he does not assume such risks, and the omission of the master to instruct or warn him is actionable negligence.

preceding subdivision. On the other hand, the supreme court of West Virginia has quoted in Oliver v. Ohio River R. Co. (1896) 42 W. Va. 703, 26 S. E. 444, with approval the following passage from a recent textbook: "It is not required that the master should see to it personally that notice comes to the knowledge of all those to be governed thereby. If there is due care and diligence in choosing competent servants to receive and transmit the necessary orders, the negligence by them in the performance of it is a risk of the employment that the coemployee takes when he enters the service." See Bailey, Master's Liability for Injuries to Servant, pp. 77, 85. The learned author considers that "after the person whose duty, on the part of the master, it is to promulgate rules, or communicate them to those engaged in the service, has performed his duty, by communicating them to a servant, who in turn is to observe them, or communicate them to another, then the omission or neglect of such other is the omission or neglect of a fellow servant, to the same extent as his disobedience of an order or rule, after receipt or knowledge. . . . would be such an act." Yet at the same time he declares that, "as to those orders or rules relating to the appliances and ways, it being the absolute duty of the master to see that such appliances and ways are reasonably safe, the master should be held to a strict liability to see that they were actually received and known." With due deference it is submitted that the distinction here relied on is logically unsound, and wholly inconsistent with the theory which makes the duty of protecting the servant by suitable rules an independent obligation co-ordinate with the obligations of seeing that the material substances which compose the instrumentalities themselves come up to the required standard. If the master is bound at all to prescribe a certain system for the guidance of his servants, it surely can make no difference whether the object aimed at is that the instrumentalities shall be of a certain quality, or that they shall be used in a certain way. In either case the obligation is referable to the general principle that he must use proper care to secure the safety of his servants, and it seems impossible to argue, with any show of reason, that one obligation arising out of that principle can be less absolute than the other. The true doctrine, we take it, is that the duty of bringing the rules to the knowledge of the servants is equally nonassignable, whatever the subject-matter may be, and that the question whether it has been performed is to be determined, not by considering the rank or number of subordinates through whom they are transmitted to the persons concerned, but

The burden was upon appellant to show that respondent was aware of the risks and danger, and the case was properly left to the jury.

by considering whether the steps taken are such that the servants, if they exercise ordinary care, cannot fail to ascertain that the rules have been framed, and that obedience to them is expected. It may be remarked, moreover, that if this duty be removed from the class of those which are nondelegable, there will be considerable difficulty, not to say impossibility, in avoiding the virtual nullification of another doctrine which regards the subject from the standpoint of the servant's obligation to observe the rules made for his benefit, viz., that his failure to comply with a rule not brought to his notice is not contributory negligence. See also note to Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1898; Conn.) 43 L. R. A. 356.

L. Duty to carry out regulations, how far absolute; generally.

In some cases it is laid down in quite general terms that the master is absolutely bound "to exercise such supervision as will make it reasonably certain that the business is being carried on pursuant to the rules" as framed. McElligott v. Randolph (1891) 61 Conn. 157, 22 Atl. 1094. Quoted in Gerrish v. New Haven Ice Co. (1893) 62 Conn. 9, 16, 27 Atl. 235.

So, also, it has been laid down, arguendo, that a railroad company is not only bound to adopt proper rules for the running of its trains, but is bound to enforce them. Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1898) 70 Conn. 159, 43 L. R. A. 305, 39 Atl. 115. But the question was not actually involved here.

But a more exact statement of principles would seem to be this: The quality of the duty in question depends upon the essential objects of the regulations which the alleged representative of the master has failed to carry out. All regulations, it is manifest, may be divided into two categories. In one we have a statement of the method by which the employer proposes to discharge some nondelegable obligation. The other relates to matters of detail with which servants may legitimately be left to deal except where the unusual complexity of the business organism creates a duty on the master's part to inform them in what manner they should perform their respective functions in order to avoid injuring themselves and their coworkers. The propriety of applying a different standard of responsibility to each of these categories is sufficiently obvious. It cannot be contended with any show of logic that the obligation of the master in respect to the supervision of mere details is rendered more extensive by the mere fact that, under the circumstances, he was bound to systematize the

McFarland, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff through the negligence of defendant. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $15,000. Defendant appeals from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

Defendant is a corporation engaged in furnishing, carrying, and distributing electricity through the city of Los Angeles for lighting, motive power, etc., over poles and running wires along the streets and public places of said city. Plaintiff was an employee of defendant, and at the time when the injuries complained of were received execution of those details by issuing general orders for the guidance of his servants. Such general orders do not alter the character of the acts to which they relate. This consideration seems to have been ignored in Mase v. Northern P. R. Co. (1893) 57 Fed. 283, where the court took the broad ground that any servant to whom is given the duty of seeing that a rule is observed is a vice principal, and held that the duty assigned to a railroad employee by the rules of the company, not to leave a switch which has been opened until it is closed or he is relieved by another employee, is one of the nondelegable duties owed by the employer to its employees.

Another decision which is questionable for the same reason is one to the effect that a railway company is not, as matter of law, free from liability, where a car repairer is injured by a car which a conductor negligently shunted onto the repair track without any brakeman upon it. Murphy v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1890) 118 N. Y. 527, 23 N. E. 812. But the correctness of this case is doubted in Potter v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1892) 136 N. Y. 77, 32 N. E. 603. The same remark is applicable to the cases cited at the end of the next subdivision.

Some of the language used by the court in Gerrish v. New Haven Ice Co. (1893) 63 Conn. 9, 27 Atl. 235, might also seem to lay the court open to the same imputation. There an ice company is guilty of negligence rendering it liable to an employee injured by the starting up of the machinery in a slide while he was at work therein under orders from the superintendent and general manager, where the latter went away from his post at a bell-cord intended to notify the engineer when to start, and failed to conform to a rule of the company requiring the engineer to be notified when any person was in the slide so that the engine would not be started at a signal from the bell without such orders, and the falling of a piece of material thrown by such employee from the slide struck the bell cord, rang the bell, and caused the engineer to start the machinery. But the case was, it would seem, really decided on the ground that the negligent act was done by the superintendent in his official capacity. See note to O'Neil v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900; Minn.) 51 L. R. A. 503.

The situation which supervenes upon the issuance of regulations expressive of the methods by which the master thinks fit to perform a personal duty is precisely the converse of this, and may reasonably be regarded as entailing entirely different consequences. There would be a palpable inconsistency in asserting that the obligation to perform the acts prescribed by such regulations is not as absolute as the obliwas at work, about 18 feet above the ground, on one of the poles of defendant's system. He was standing on a small platform attached to the pole, and was engaged in scraping one of the wires, when he suddenly fell to the ground, and was badly injured. It is not contended that the place where plaintiff was working was unsafe on account of its height, or for any defect in the platform. It is averred, however, in the complaint, that his fall was caused by a strong electrical shock, which rendered him unconscious, and threw him backwards to the ground; and there was sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in finding that this averment was true. At the time of the action, plaintiff was working under the directions of one Burge, who was a foreman in charge of a gang of men of which plaintiff was one, and at this time Burge was himself working on the same pole, several feet above the platform on which plaintiff stood. The evidence does not make it entirely clear how the current of electricity came in contact with plaintiff's person. It is averred in the complaint that at the time plaintiff reached the platform there was a strong current running at that point through the wires, parts of which were not insulated. Defendant contends that this was not true; that the wires then were all "dead;" and that, if plaintiff was touched by a current at all, such current was turned on afterwards by the said Burge. And therefore defendant contends that, if plaintiff was injured at all by a current of electricity which was negligently permitted to pass through the wires where he was working, the negligence was that of Burge; that the latter was a coemployee and fellow servant with plain-tion to afford the servants that particular kind of protection which they will receive if the duty to which the regulations have reference is adequately discharged. Hence the accepted doctrine is that "whenever the act is that of the master, or the duty to be performed is particularly his duty, the liability resting upon him for the proper performance of the act or duty is not shifted by the adoption of rules or regulations providing for the performance of the act or duty by the agent of the master." Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1894) 142 N. Y. 416, 25 L. R. A. 396, 37 N. E. 466. Or, as it has also been put in another case, a master cannot relieve himself from liability for an injury to an employee, resulting from a failure on his part, through his agents, actually to use such care for the safety of employees as the law makes it necessary for him to use, by any regulations, however stringent and however completely enforced, which do not actually result in the use of such care by his agents. Missouri P. R. Co. v. McElroy (1888) 71 Tex. 386, 1 L. R. A. 411, 9 S. W. 313.

A master, therefore, is liable for the negligence of an employee to whom is deputed the performance of the one special act without which a rule prescribed with a view to making the place of work safe would be wholly inefficacious. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Holcomb (1894) 9 Ind. App. 198, 36 N. E. 39, where a railroad company was held liable for the injuries received by a car repairer in consequence of the negligence of a brakeman, who was directed to notify him, in accordance with a rule of the company, that an engine was about to enter upon the track where he was working.

Compare Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Taylor (1873) 69 Ill. 461, 18 Am. Rep. 626. In that case injury to a station agent and switchman at a way station was caused by the negligence of other servants of the company whose duty it was, under the rules, to see that cars should not go out upon the road without proper lights and proper brakes. The common master was held liable, and the servant recovered damages.

The great extension which the master's responsibility for dangers of the transitory class receives as a result of conceding a right of action on such a ground is made especially manifest by the decisions adverted to in the following subdivisions. Attention may here be drawn to the fact that in any case where the delinquency complained of was that of an employee who, according to the view accepted in the jurisdiction where the accident occurred, was a vice principal by virtue of his superior rank (see note to O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. [1900; Minn.] 51 L. R. A. 588, 589), the 54 L. R. A.

master's liability is referable indifferently, either to the theory that the enforcement of rules is a nondelegable obligation, or to the theory that negligence in carrying out rules is reckoned among the official acts of a vice principal. Thus, if one of the rules of the railroad company, furnished to a section foreman for his guidance, provides that "extra trains may pass over the road at any time, without previous notice, and the foreman [of a gang of trackmen] must be always prepared for them;" and another rule provides that "he must run the hand cars with great caution, and he must not permit them to be used unless he accompany them;" and another rule requires him "to compare his time each day with the clock at the nearest telegraph office, or with the conductor on the train,"—these rules, as well as the law, require him to use the opportunities thus daily afforded, or any other opportunities, to ascertain what trains are expected to run over his section of the track by previous arrangements and when, so that he may be prepared for them as well as he can be, and thus diminish the risk of a collision of extra trains with the hand car. If he neglects this duty, and, without any fault of one of the laborers under him, his hand car comes in collision with an extra train, which, had he performed his duty, would not have occurred, and the laborer on the hand car is killed or injured, the railroad company will be liable for the damages so sustained. Criswell v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. (1888) 30 W. Va. 798, 6 S. E. 31.

So, also, in Moore v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. (1885) 85 Mo. 588, where it was held that the servant of a railway company may rely on the vice principal's promise to protect him while at work on a side track, notwithstanding the existence of a rule of the company requiring servants to protect themselves by putting out flags while engaged in such work, the court said: "It being conceded, as it must be, that the company owed a duty to the men under the car to provide for their safety, can it be that the foreman had no authority in an emergency to use any other means than those adopted by the company? That the red flags, and nothing but the red flags, was the means he was to employ? If for any reason that would clearly, in a given case, have been insufficient as a warning, can it be possible that the foreman would be restricted to the use of the red flags? Or if, in such case, he had had the red flag set up, and one of the men was injured in consequence of its insufficiency to give the warning, that the company would not be liable to the injured party? Has it discharged its duty by simply adopting a means of protection ordinarily suffitiff; and that plaintiff cannot recover of the employer, the defendant, for injuries caused by the negligence of the fellow servant, Burge. There is no doubt that plaintiff and Burge were, in a general sense, fellow servants. This relation between them was not changed by the fact that Burge occupied a superior position in the general service. Donovan v. Ferris, 128 Cal. 48, 60 Pac. 519, and cases there cited. If, therefore, plaintiff was injured by the negligence of Burge, and the negligence did not involve a duty which the defendant, as employer, owed personally to plaintiff, as employee, then the offending fellow servant was alone responsible, and the judgment against defendant was unwarranted, as there is no claim that there was any want of care in selecting Burge, or that he was in any way incompetent. But there are certain duties which an employer owes personally to his employees, and he cannot avoid responsibility for injury to one servant, caused by the failure to perform such duties by delegating their performance to another servant. In such case the fellow servant to whom the performance of such duties is assigned becomes, with respect to that particular duty, the special representative of the employer,—sometimes called a vice principal. In such case the negligence of the servant is the negligence of the principal, for which the latter must answer. See Davis v. Southern P. Co. 98 Cal. 13, 32 Pac. 646; Callan v. Bull, 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017; Elledge v. National City & O. R. Co. 100 Cal. 282, 34 Pac. 720; Nixon v. Selby Smelting & Lead Co. 102 Cal. 458, 36 Pac. 803. Some of such duties, well established in the law, are to furnish proper machinery and appliances and keep them in repair, to dent, when the person in charge of the work knows that, in the particular case, it is not a sufficient warning? If the foreman has authority in such an emergency, that authority results from his general authority to perform the duty of the company in protecting the employees under his control in the performance of a dangerous work for the company, and he was authorized to make the promise to the plaintiff for the company, and undertook to set out the red flags in his possession, or to adopt any other means necessary to secure the safety of the men, thereby absolving them from the duty of setting out the flag, or setting the watch."

It should also be noted that by thus segregating regulations into two categories determined by their subject-matter, we obtain a fairly satisfactory ground on which to meet the point made by some courts that the "superior-servant doctrine" is legitimately deducible from the doctrine that an employee who promulgates or carries out regulations is a vice principal. See note to O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900: Minn.) 51 L. R. A. 546, 547.

In Card v. Eddy (1893: Mo.) 24 S. W. 746, it was held that a section foreman in charge of a gang of laborers at work along a railway is not a fellow servant with a locomotive fireman while the latter is delivering a message from the road master by throwing it, while tied to a lump of coal, from a passing train, as in so delivering the message he represents the master. Replying to the argument of defendant's counsel that the fireman, as to the act in question, was temporarily in the road department, and thus a fellow servant of the section foreman, the court said: "But this line of argument is intercepted by another proposition. It is the master's personal duty to give direction to the work in hand, and in the matter of communicating necessary directions for that work, by authority of the master, all employees represent the master. For a want of ordinary care in the transmission of such directions or orders the master is liable, if injury results. It has been expressly so held in this state, where the negligent act was performed by a train despatcher in transmitting an order for the movement of trains. Smith v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. (1887) 92 Mo. 359, 4 S. W. 129. The principle underlying that judgment is applicable to the facts now before us. There is positive proof here that for many years the practice had prevailed to deliver orders to the section foremen, while engaged at work along the road, by the intervention of employees on the trains to pass the points where the foremen were working. This practice was so general and long continued that it might fairly be found that the master was chargeable with knowledge of it. The proof, however, goes further than that, and positively shows that the practice was part of the method adopted by the road-master himself for communicating orders to his subordinate foremen. Such being the case, it seems to us that in delivering such messages through the agency of the trainmen, the road master represented the defendants, and that the latter should be held answerable for negligence in the transmission of such orders, whereby the plaintiff suffered the injury which forms the basis of this action."

The analogy thus emphasized evidently loses at least a part of its force when we advert to the fact that the quality of the master's obligations with respect to general directions for the conduct of the work varies according to circumstances.

m. Duty to carry out regulations with respect to the movements of trains.

The principles explained in the preceding subdivision have been extensively discussed in that important class of cases which deal with the liability of railway companies for the negligence of employees concerned with the movements of trains. The cases referred to below show that, on the whole, the courts are agreed as to the propriety of making a distinction between the officials ordinarily known as train despatchers and the employees who communicate the direction of those train despatchers to the servants operating the trains. But it is often quite difficult to say whether the act which caused the injury should be treated as one incident to functions of control or to the discharge of ministerial duties merely.

1. Doctrine that train despatchers are vice principals; generally.

It is settled law in most jurisdictions in this country that any employee who is invested with a discretionary power to regulate the running of the trains over an entire railway system or one of its subdivisions represents the railway company in respect to anything which he does in the exercise of that power, whether the despatch of trains is his sole function (Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. v. Frost [1896] 21 C. A. 186, 44 U. S. App. 606, 74 Fed. 965; Crew v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. [1884] 20 Fed. 87; Clyde v. Richmond & D. R. Co. [1895] 69 Fed. 673; Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. Barry [1893] 58 Ark. 198, 25 L. R. A. 386, 23 S. W. 1097; Darrigan v. New York & N. E. R. Co. [1885] 52 Conn. 285, 52 Am. Rep. 590 [Granger, exercise care in selecting competent servants, to take reasonable care for the safety of the employees, etc. It is also one of these duties to give careful instructions, directions, and warnings to a youthful or inexperienced servant of unusual and hidden dangers of which the employer is aware, and of which the servant, to the employer's knowledge, is ignorant. Ingerman v. Moore, 90 Cal. 410, 27 Pac. 306, and authorities there cited; Ryan v. Los Angeles Ice & Cold Storage Co. 112 Cal. 244, 32 L. R. A. 524, 44 Pac. 471; Gibson v. Sterling Furniture Co. 113 Cal. 1, 45 Pac. 5; Verdelli v. Gray's Harbor Commercial Co. 115 Cal. 517, 47 Pac. 384; Higgins v. Williams, 114 Cal. 176, 45 Pac. 1041; Mullin v. California Horse-shoe Co. 105 Cal. 77, 38 Pac. 535; Hanley v. California Bridge & Constr. Co. 127 Cal. 232, 47 L. R. A. 597, 59 Pac. 577. And in such case the employer cannot escape the responsibility by delegating this duty to a fellow servant of the person injured. See cases above cited. Now, in the case at bar it is averred in the complaint that plaintiff was employed by defendant as a common, unskilled laborer, to do "the ordinary work of digging holes for electric poles, repairing electric poles, driving a horse and wagon, and in performing other street work for the maintenance of said poles and wires used in said business of the defendant; and said work was not of a skilled kind, nor was said work of a dangerous character." It is further averred that the work of a "line-man" in defendant's business required great skill and care, and was of a dangerous character; that the dangerous character of such work was well known to defendant, but that plaintiff was wholly unacquainted with the McLallen* [1876] 84 Ill. 109 [assistant superintendent held to be vice principal in respect to giving orders as to the running of a wild train]); or master mechanic. Northern P. R. Co. v. Poirier (1895) 15 C. C. A. 52, 29 U. S. App. 583, 67 Fed. 881; McKune v. California Southern R. Co. (1885) 66 Cal. 302, 5 Pac. 482 (train sent out without a light).

Such employees are regarded as agents to whom is "delegated supreme authority in the special service" (Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Clark [1893] 6 C. C. A. 281, 16 U. S. App. 17, 57 Fed. 125), and to whom is given full control in the management of trains through the telegraph. Hunn v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1889) 78 Mich. 513, 7 L. R. A. 500, 44 N. W. 502.

The duty of such employee pertains to management and direction, while the duty of a trainman pertains to obedience. Smith v. Washash, St. L. & P. R. Co. (1887) 92 Mo. 359, 4 S. W. 129. Compare Darrigan v. New York & 54 L. R. A.

N. E. R. Co. (1885) 52 Conn. 285, 52 Am. Rep. 590, which also dwells on the fact that in emergencies such an employee must promptly obey the orders of his superiors.

The plaintiffs in most of the cases in which the company's liability is affirmed were train hands, but the right of other employees, such as track repairers, to recover for negligence in directing the movements of a train is equally unquestionable. Haynes v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. (1866) 3 Coldw. 222 (plaintiff was a track repairer); Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Smith (1890) 76 Tex. 611, 13 S. W. 562 (plaintiff was a laborer traveling on a work train).

2. Train despatchers represent the company as to special orders suspending regular time-tables.

For the cases turning upon the theory that the act of some servant is negligent for the reason that he disobeys some general rule by the command of a superior who has no authority to waive it, see note to Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1898; Conn.) 43 L. R. A. 348.

Most of the accidents due to the negligence of train despatchers are naturally the result of special orders rendered necessary by the movements of extra trains not provided for in the regular time-tables, or by the failure of the trains specified in such time-tables to arrive at certain stations at the hours appointed. That such orders are issued by train despatchers as agents of the companies is recognized by all the courts which regard them as vice principals. In fact there would be little or no utility in holding them to be vice principals if the doctrine were taken to be inapplicable under such circumstances. In Lewis v. Seifert (1887) 116 Pa. 628, 11 Atl. 514, the court reasoned thus: "It is . . . clear that it was its [the company's] duty to frame and promulgate such rules and schedules for the moving of its trains as would afford reasonable safety to the operatives who were engaged in moving them. This is a direct, positive duty which the company owed its employees, and for the failure to perform which it would be responsible to any person injured as a consequence thereof, whether such person be a passenger or an employee. It would be a monstrous doctrine to hold that a railroad company could frame such schedules as would inevitably, or even probably, result in collisions and loss of life. This is a personal, positive duty; and, while a corporation is compelled to act through agents, yet the agents in performing duties of this character stand in the place of, and represent, the principal. In duties and dangers of such work, and wholly unskilled therein,—“all of which was at all times herein stated known to said defendant; and said plaintiff did not know, nor was he ever informed by said defendant, nor by anyone else, of the dangerous character of such work, nor of the risk incident thereto.” And it is further averred that, being thus, to defendant’s knowledge, inexperienced, and ignorant of the dangers of the work of a lineman upon wires, he was, without any instructions or warning, and without being furnished with rubber gloves or other protective appliances used by linemen, negligently ordered by defendant to ascend said pole and scrape the wires. While there was some conflict in the testimony as to some of these averments, there was sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in finding that they were true; and, this being so, other words, they are vice principals. If it be the duty to provide schedules for the moving of its trains which shall be reasonably safe, it follows logically that when the schedules are departed from, when trains are sent out without a schedule, such orders should be issued by the company as will afford reasonable protection to the employees engaged in the running of such trains. I am not speaking now of collisions caused by a disobedience of orders on the part of conductors and engineers, but of collisions or other accidents the result of obeying such orders. At the time of the collision referred to, Wellington Bertolette was the general despatcher of the defendant company, and from his office in Philadelphia had the general power and authority of moving the trains. In this he was not interfered with by the company or anyone else. For the purpose of sending out the trains, he wielded all the power of the company. He could send a train out on schedule time or he could hold it back. He could change the schedule time or make new schedules as the exigency of the case required. He could send a train out without schedule, and direct its movements from his office in Philadelphia. When he issued an order the train was bound to move as he directed. The engineer and conductor had but one duty, and that was obedience.

... It is true the order in this case was sent by John J. Sellers. But Sellers was the assistant of Bertolette, and in his absence was clothed with all his powers. For the purposes of this case Sellers was Bertolette and Bertolette was the company. The distinction between a general despatcher—one who has the absolute control of all the trains upon the road—and the conductor or engineer of a train is manifest. The latter have the duty of obedience. Their business is to run their trains under orders from the despatcher, and if an employee is injured as the result of their negligence, the company is not liable. They are in the same common employment, and are laboring together to the same end, under orders from superior authority. The argument for the plaintiff in error, if carried to its logical conclusion, would wholly obliterate all distinction between railroad employees from the president down, as they may all be said to be in one sense in the same common employment and paid by the same corporation.”

The same view has been adopted in New York, where a railroad company has been held liable for the negligence of a train despatcher, the reasoning of the court being as follows: “In this case the evidence would seem to be quite conclusive that the defendant had fully discharged the duty which it owed its employees in the way of establishing and promulgating ap-

it was the duty of defendant to inform and warn plaintiff of the peril to which he ignorantly exposed himself by coming in contact with an invisible and dangerous electrical current. The contention, therefore, that under the law the verdict was not warranted by the evidence, cannot be maintained.

There are a number of exceptions to instructions given by the court on its own motion, to instructions given at the request of plaintiff, and to the refusal of instructions asked by defendant. We do not, however, deem it necessary to discuss these instructions in detail. If the law be as above stated,—that is, if the duty to instruct and warn plaintiff as above stated was a duty which defendant personally owed to plaintiff, and which it could not avoid by delegating it to Burge,—then the rulings of the proper and sufficient rules and regulations for the government and operation of the various trains upon its road and its furnishing general time-tables pertaining thereto. Whether the train despatcher violated one or all of such rules is not material in the view we take of the case, because the defendant had not performed its whole duty in promulgating rules, nor is a defense made out when it is shown that, if the train despatcher had obeyed the rules, the accident would not have occurred. If the defendant owed a duty as master to give correct orders to these trains, or at least to take due and reasonable care to give them, the failure to perform that duty is the failure of the master in his character as such, although he intrusted the performance of the duty to the train despatcher. These trains were being run without regard to their ordinary time-tables; they were several hours late, proceeding in opposite directions, and each was approaching the other in entire ignorance of the other’s whereabouts. Both were necessarily dependent upon the special orders they received from Hornellsville. As was said in Slater v. Jewett (1881) 85 N. Y. 62, 29 Am. Rep. 627, the master had the right to vary from the regular time schedules laid down for these trains. It was part of the details incident to the operation of the road, but when a variation, or, in other words, when a special time-table is made out for two trains by which they are to run, it is the duty of the master, not alone to take reasonable care that the alteration shall be made known to the parties interested, but also to take reasonable care that the variation ordered, and by which the trains are run, shall not necessarily or probably lead to disaster when obediently carried out. Reasonable care in originating and formulating the order is necessary, and is the duty of the master. When the train despatcher originates and promulgates such orders as were given in this case, he is acting as the master, or, as it is said, his alter ego, and the master is liable for the negligence of the agent he has employed to do his, the master’s, particular work.” Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1894) 142 N. Y. 416, 25 L. E. A. 396, 37 N. E. 466, Reversing 55 Hun, 51, 8 N. Y. Supp. 272.

Similarly, it is held in Connecticut that the effect of certain rules as to running trains by special orders, by one of which it is provided that all orders shall be given by a superintendent, or by a despatcher under the direction of a superintendent, and by another that superintendents are supreme in their own divisions, and responsible only to the management for such orders as they may give, is to delegate to the court in giving and refusing instructions were correct. The main objection made by defendant to these rulings is that they should have been made upon the theory that Burge and plaintiff were fellow servants, and that the general rule as to injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow servant should be rigidly applied to the case at bar, and that defendant was not responsible if Burge neglected to inform and warn plaintiff of the dangers, to him unknown, to which a compliance with Burge's order exposed him. In the instructions on other points we see no error. Questions of fact were properly submitted to the jury.

It is strenuously contended that the verdict is excessive. The amount of damages awarded by the jury was, under the circumstances, quite large. A smaller amount would, perhaps, have been more just. But we cannot say that, as a matter of law, the verdict should be set aside on the ground of excessive damages.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: Temple, J.; Henshaw, J.

train despatcher the whole power of the corporation in respect to moving the trains safely, and therefore to make him the representative of the company in that regard. Darrigan v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (1884) 52 Conn. 285, 52 Am. Rep. 590. The court said: "It is the duty of a railroad corporation to prepare a timetable and adjust the running of its trains so as to avoid collisions. It must also devise some suitable and safe method by which to run special and irregular trains, and regular trains when off their regular time. That cannot be done by general rules. Emergencies will arise which no system of rules can anticipate and provide for, in which the company must act, and act promptly and efficiently. In this case the scheme devised was to have these trains controlled by one who knew the position and movement of every train on the road liable to be affected by them,—a train despatcher acting in the name and by the authority of the superintendent. Is there not a wide and manifest difference between the duty of such an agent and the duty of a locomotive engineer?"

In Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Smith (1890) 76 Tex. 611, 13 S. W. 562, the court said: "Upon the hypothesis that the company is bound to inform its servants and warn them of what is necessary to avoid collisions with trains, and that it cannot shift its own duty to a servant and then in case of injury claim that it was the result of negligence of a fellow servant, the foregoing cases will stand upon the same principle. A failure to perform this duty increases the risk of employees on and operating trains, and exposes them to risk not embraced in their implied contract. The company ought to know where its trains are, and if the operators do not know it is the duty of the company to inform them, and give such orders as are reasonably necessary to avoid increased peril." Supp. 207 (irregular train so run as to cause accident); Goodman v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1895) 107 Pa. 332, 31 Atl. 670 (wild train sent out collided with another); Washburn v. Nashville & C. R. Co. (1859) 3 Head, 638, 75 54 L. R. A.

Am. Dec. 784 (superintendent started a train out of time, without any precaution to avoid a collision with a train coming in the opposite direction); Hogan v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1895) 88 Tex. 679, 32 S. W. 1035; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Arispe (1893) 5 Tex. Civ. App. 611, 23 S. W. 928, Rehearing denied in 5 Tex. Civ. App. 817, 24 S. W. 33 (conflicting orders caused collision); Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Stuart (1898; Tex. Civ. App.) 48 S. W. 799, Reversed on other grounds in (1899) 92 Tex. 540, 50 S. W. 333; Phillips v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1885) 64 Wis. 475, 25 N. W. 544.

By some rules it is expressly stated that they may be suspended by the special order of some specified agent of the employers. See Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Henderson (1882) 37 Ohio St. 549, where the rule under discussion, which regulated the movements of freight trains, provided for its suspension by the company's superintendent, and for the precautions to be observed during such suspension.

No trainman has any voice in running a train by special order, but is simply charged with the duty of carrying out the orders that come to him from the train despatcher's office. Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1894) 142 N. Y. 416, 25 L. R. A. 396, 37 N. E. 466. Compare also, as to this consideration, the Pennsylvania and Connecticut cases cited, supra.

The mere fact that the orders given by the train despatcher were verbal instead of written, where the rules call for the latter, makes no difference. Smith v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. (1887) 92 Mo. 359, 4 S. W. 129.

But the right to rely implicitly upon the propriety of a special order from a train despatcher cannot be extended to cases in which the circumstances are such that a prudent man would feel bound to seek some further information as to the reason why the regular routine of the business has been in this instance departed from. In Wescott v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (1891) 163 Mass. 460, 27 N. E. 10, the conductor of a train was held to be negligent in starting the train, when he knew that, under the rules, he had no right to do so until the arrival of a certain train, without inquiring of the despatcher on that section of the road whether he had received any special information which would make it safe to leave the station. The court said that, even supposing that it was ordinarily his duty to obey the orders of the despatcher, even if they were in violation of the rules of the road, this particular order was so obviously wrong, and was likely to involve such dreadful consequences, that it was manifestly negligent to act upon it without inquiring the reason for it.

One form of special order consists in the substitution of a temporary for the regular timetable. The promulgation of the former, no less than the latter is deemed to be an act done in pursuance of the company's absolute duty. Frost v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (1895) 69 Fed. 936, where it was held that a telegraph operator in giving notice to an engineer of a temporary change in the running time of his train was performing a duty of the company. The distinction taken in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Camp (1895) 13 C. A. 233, 31 U. S. App. 213, 65 Fed. 952, (see III. m. 4, infra), was disapproved. The company is, of course, no less liable where the train despatcher has failed altogether to issue the orders required by the emergency (Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. McLallen [1876] 64 Ill. 109; Sutherland v. Troy & B. R. Co. [1899] 28 N. Y. S. R. 201, 8 N. Y. Supp. 83 [despatcher should have sent orders to have a train stopped by signal at a certain station]; McChesney v. Panama R. Co. [1892] 49 N. Y. S. R. 148, 21 N. Y. Supp. 207, [1893] 74 Hun. 150, 26 N. Y. Supp. 245 [injury partly caused by the instructions actually issued, and partly by the lack of full instructions]; Louisville, C. & L. E. Co. v. Cavens [1873] 9 Bush, 559 [despatcher failed to stop a train following another which had been "stalled" on a gradient]); or to give obligatory information as to the movements of trains (Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Heck [1898] 151 Ind. 292, 50 N. E. 983, which holds that a train despatcher's disregard of a rule prescribing that an extra train despatched after a work train has already gone out on the road shall be notified to protect itself against such work train is such negligence as will render the company liable for injuries caused by a collision between the two trains; Clyde v. Richmond & D. R. Co. [1895] 69 Fed. 673 [engineer injured owing to the fact that a station master was not notified as to the coming of an extra freight train]; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Smith [1890] 76 Tex. 611, 13 S. W. 562. See also Northern P. R. Co. v. Charles [1892] 2 C. C. A. 380, 7 U. S. App. 359, 51 Fed. 562, where it was laid down in general terms that it is the duty of a railroad company to keep the hands employed on a certain section informed as to the movement of trains over it, and that it is therefore liable for injuries resulting to one of them from the neglect of a telegraph operator to communicate such information. The question of the responsibilities generally of a telegraph operator was expressly waived, the case being decided on a demurrer to a complaint which alleged the existence of the above duty and its breach), than it is for his negligence in sending improper orders.

The single prerequisite of liability under the above doctrine is that the delinquent should have been an employee intrusted with discretionary powers to regulate the movements of the trains as seems most conducive to the interests of the company. This conception is emphasized in McChesney v. Panama R. Co. (1892) 49 N. Y. S. R. 148, 21 N. Y. Supp. 207. See also the extracts quoted supra.

Hence a train despatcher clothed with the powers of a general train despatcher in his absence, is no less a vice principal than the official whose place he takes. Lewis v. Seifert (1887) 116 Pa. 628, 11 Atl. 514. Compare also the cases cited infra.

Nor is the company allowed to escape responsibility simply because the party who sends the orders respecting the trains issues them in the name of some superior official, such as a division superintendent (Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Heck [1898] 151 Ind. 292, 50 N. E. 983); or an assistant superintendent.

In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. McLallen (1876) 64 Ill. 109, the court reasoned thus: "As between the conductor and the company the assistant superintendent to whose orders the trains are all subject is the representative of the corporation. His orders to the conductor of a train are essentially the orders of the employer. This rule applies as well to all orders issued by his assistants in his office and issued in his name. These orders were all signed in the 54 L. R. A.

name of Chappell, the assistant superintendent. If those intrusted by him with the management of the business of the corporation by orders issued in his name neglect to issue a necessary order, that is his neglect and the negligence of the corporation."

Still less is such a circumstance a bar to the action, where the ordinary routine of a railway office, acquiesced in by the general superintendent and other officials, is that the despatches are sent in such superintendent's name, and the evidence is that he was absent when the despatch in question was sent. Lasky v. Canadian P. R. Co. (1891) 83 Me. 461, 22 Atl. 367. The court said: "The defendants assail the plaintiff's case from another position. Inasmuch as the despatch to the plaintiff was really sent in the superintendent's name by the train despatcher at Brownville, the superintendent not being there at the time and not cognizant of it, the plaintiff himself being fully aware of the facts, it is contended that the plaintiff cannot prevail in the action because he and the train despatcher were fellow servants in the same employment. We do not assent to this position. It appears that it was customary for the train despatcher thus to use the superintendent's name, and that the practice was acquiesced in by the superintendent and other officials connected with the road. An act done for the superintendent by his authority, either general or special, is his act. The employee is not required nor permitted to investigate the question of authority. The superintendent's name conclusively imports authority, unless it be forged. The servant must obey or be discharged from his employment. It would greatly demoralize the service if it were otherwise. Performance of duty to the road places all consequent liabilities upon the road."

Another way of arriving at the same result is to say that, for the purpose of fastening liability of the company, any officer acting by the authority of the superintendent is put upon the same footing as the superintendent himself. O'Laughlin v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1887) 27 N. Y. Week. Dig. 109, 9 N. Y. S. R. 384.

3. Doctrine that train despatchers are not vice principals.

The decisions in which superintendents and train despatchers have been held to be mere co-servants of trainmen are either rulings by courts in which the general doctrine of common employment was relied on, and the effect of the distinction between the master's assignable or non-assignable duties was not adverted to or discussed (Robertson v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. [1881] 78 Ind. 77, 41 Am. Rep. 552; Millsaps v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. [1891] 69 Miss. 423, 13 So. 690; Wonder v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. [1870] 32 Md. 411, 3 Am. Rep. 143); or cases in which the negligence alleged had no relation to the operation of trains (Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Hoover [1894] 79 Md. 253, 25 L. R. A. 710, 29 Atl. 994); or which turned upon some special grounds, as that the plaintiff did not offer evidence tending to show that no co-service existed. Blessing v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. (1883) 77 Mo. 410.

It seems doubtful whether, even in Missouri itself, this last case would now be followed (see Smith v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. [1887] 92 Mo. 359, 4 S. W. 129); but, at all events, it carries a useful warning to practitioners.

4. Liability of railway companies for the negligence of servants who transmit the orders or see that they are carried out.

In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Camp (1895) 13 C. C. A. 233, 31 U. S. App. 213, 65 Fed. 952

(cited III. m. 2, supra), it was laid down that a train despatcher, in devising a temporary timetable which, in a sudden emergency, is to take the place of the regular time-table, and in issuing telegraphic orders for the operation of the trains under the new schedule, acts as a vice principal; but a telegraph operator who merely transmits to the trainmen the directions he receives from the train despatcher as to the movements of the trains is a fellow servant of the engineer. To the same effect, see Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Clark (1893) 6 C. C. A. 281, 16 U. S. App. 17, 57 Fed. 125.

When the proper servant is so informed and ordered, and he then neglects his duty or violates his orders, causing injury to another servant, the negligence is his, and the doctrine of fellow servants would apply. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Smith (1890) 76 Tex. 618, 18 S. W. 562, where it was held that, if the delinquent roadmaster had control of the train men operating a work train and its movements, and was guilty of negligence in moving the train from a certain station without notification as to the approach of specials with which there was danger of collision, or if his neglect consisted in having the train stopped at another station for such time as rendered the danger of collision with other trains imminent, the negligence would be his own as a servant of the company, and not the negligence of the company.

As already remarked, the line which separates the two breaches of duty here contrasted is sometimes rather thin, but it seems more than probable that the cases referred to infra would not be approved in all jurisdictions.

The omission of a telegraph operator at a way platform to see that a despatch was understood by the conductor of a train, by whose negligence the plaintiff, the engineer of another train, was injured, is an act for which the company is responsible. Madden v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (1886) 28 W. Va. 610, 57 Am. Rep. 695.

Neither the conductor of a train coming into collision with a car having section hands on board standing upon the track at a station, because of such conductor's disregard of signals displayed at the station, nor a telegraph operator at such station who displays improper signals, can be regarded as a fellow servant of such section hands. Haney v. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. (1893) 38 W. Va. 570, 18 S. E. 748.

The telegraph operator in charge of a signal station, who controls by signal orders the running of trains over a block section of a railroad, is not the fellow servant of a brakeman injured on such section by the operator's negligent management of the running of trains. Flannegan v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (1895) 40 W. Va. 436, 21 S. E. 1028, following the last-cited case. The court said: "In this case the defendant, seeking to discharge its personal duty, and provide a safe track, and at the same time facilitate the rapid movement of trains, established the signal station, and placed the operator in charge with full authority, by means of a code of signal orders equally as effective as any other kind could possibly be, to control the running of all trains over this block; and all trainmen of every train were under absolute rule to watch for and obey her orders before they dare enter upon the block. If she had been attentive to her duties, she must have known the block was occupied and obstructed, and her knowledge was the knowledge of the master; yet, in the face of that fact, she negligently gives a peremptory signal for the train to proceed. In what way could she possibly be the fellow servant of the train men, who are entirely at her command, and who can neither influence nor control her own independent actions? She is as much the master of her section block as the master is of the whole road." 54 L. R. A.

A station agent charged with the duty to see that all cars were so placed on the sidetracks as to be clear from trains passing on the main line is not a fellow servant of a section hand upon a work train passing such station. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Biggs (1894) 53 Ill. App. 550.

Some other doubtful decisions are noted in the preceding section.

n. Duty to impart information as to permanent dangers normally incident to the work at the time it is entered upon.

Contrast V. n, infra.

In any case in which, for one or other of the reasons explained in the note to James v. Rapides Lumber Co. (1898; La.) 44 L. R. A. 33, a master owes his servant the duty of explaining to him the nature of the dangers to which the work will regularly and normally expose him, and the most effectual means by which to avoid them, that duty is not discharged by delegating the performance of it to an agent.

If he cannot perform the duty himself he must provide a competent person to give such necessary instruction; and, whether the person selected for that purpose be a coemployee of the promoted servant or not, the employer must see to it that he is a competent and trustworthy instructor; otherwise he will be liable for the consequences of his incompetency or negligence. The person to whom the duty of giving the necessary instruction in such cases is delegated represents the employer and pro hac vice occupies the position of vice principal. Lebbering v. Struthers (1893) 157 Pa. 812, 27 Atl. 720.

In Wheeler v. Wason Mfg. Co. (1883) 135 Mass. 297, the defendant presented the question whether the master's duty of giving notice to his servant of risks and perils to which the latter will be exposed in the course of his employment, when such duty exists, is an absolute one, or whether it is merely the duty of taking reasonable and proper pains to inform the servant of them. This question arose in three forms: (1) In the refusal to instruct the jury that, if the defendant's foreman directed a coservant of the plaintiff to give proper instruction and caution to the plaintiff, the latter could recover by reason of such coservant's failure to do so, if he was a competent person for that purpose; (2) in the instruction that, if there were dangers in the business known to the defendant, which by reason of the plaintiff's inexperience were unknown to him, and which by the exercise of ordinary care he could not have known, the defendant is bound at its peril to give him reasonable warning of them; and (3) in the exclusion of the evidence of what the foreman told the coservant to do, in instructing the plaintiff. The court said: "That question was somewhat considered in Coombs v. New Bedford Cordage Co. (1869) 102 Mass. 572, 596, 3 Am. Rep. 506. But the question here is the more general one, whether it is an affirmative, positive duty resting upon the master, for the non-performance of which he will be liable, or whether it can be delegated to a proper substitute, and he be thereby relieved from responsibility. We are of opinion that the duty resting upon the master is not merely one of reasonable care and diligence to give a proper notice; but that he is responsible in case the servant suffers through a want of receiving a proper notice of the risks to which he is exposed. The servant does not assume, and is not to bear the risk of, unknown and undisclosed perils; but he is held to take those risks which he knows, or which, by the exercise of ordinary care, he ought to know, to be incident to the nature of the business in the place where and the manner in which it is carried on. The master's duty is to provide machinery which is reasonably safe and proper; and if the use of it is attended with special peril, such as his servants ought to know, and if there is, accordingly, under the circumstances of the particular case, a duty resting upon him in respect to giving notice to the servants of such special peril, that duty is not discharged by delegating the performance of it to a third person. The servants should not be held to assume and undertake to bear the risk of latent and concealed perils, merely because the master takes reasonable care and pains to give notice of them. It is more reasonable to hold that, where the danger is known to the master and unknown to the servant, the master should be held to see to it that the servant, when put upon work which exposes him to danger, should be informed of it. The master must not expose his servant to an unreasonable risk. Where the servant is as well acquainted as the master with the dangerous nature of the machinery or instrument used, or of the service in which he is engaged, he cannot recover. But where the master employs a servant in the use of machinery which he knows, but the servant does not know, to be attended with peculiar danger, we are all of opinion that he must be held responsible for an injury which occurs in consequence of his failure to see to it that a proper notice is given."

In Brennan v. Gordon (1890) 118 N. Y. 480, 8 L. R. A. 818, 28 N. E. 810, it was held that there was error in a charge given at the request of defendant that, "If the jury find, as matter of fact, that the plaintiff was put under instruction of a competent instructor, and that the instructor was as well acquainted as defendants with the nature and character of the service which he undertook to perform, he cannot recover." The court said: "The jury could not otherwise understand this instruction than to mean that the defendants' whole duty to the plaintiff was performed when they assigned as competent an instructor to plaintiff as the defendants were. This was erroneous in two respects. The degree of the instructor's competency was gauged by the competency of the defendants. The plaintiff was entitled to have, and the defendants were bound to provide him with, an instructor competent to teach the art of managing an elevator, regardless of the competency of the defendants in that respect, and of which there was no proof whatever in the case. But the defendants were not only bound to furnish plaintiff with an instructor absolutely competent to manage an elevator, but the defendants were also bound to provide such an instructor for a reasonable length of time to teach the plaintiff how to manage the elevator, and that the instructor should be guilty of no negligence to the injury of the plaintiff while he was being instructed. These relations spring from the fact that during this period the instructor is doing the work and standing in the place of the defendants, the masters." To the same effect are the following cases: Sullivan v. India Mfg. Co. (1878) 118 Mass. 386; Verdell v. Gray's Harbor Commercial Co. (1897) 115 Cal. 517, 47 Pac. 364; Felice v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1897) 14 App. Div. 345, 43 N. Y. Supp. 922; Emma Cotton Seed Oil Co. v. Hale (1892) 54 Ark. 232, 19 S. W. 600; Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Laack (1892) 143 Ill. 242, 18 L. R. A. 215, 32 N. E. 285; Keller v. Gaskill (1898) 20 Ind. App. 502, 50 N. E. 863; Olson v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1888) 38 Minn. 117, 35 N. W. 966; Consolidated Coal Co. v. Wombacher (1890) 134 Ill. 57, 24 N. E. 627; Thomas v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. (1899) 97 Fed. 245; Addicks v. Christoph (1899) 62 N. J. L. 786, 43 Atl. 196; Lebbering v. Struthers (1893) 157 Pa. 312, 27 Atl. 720; Smith v. Hillside Coal 54 L. R. A.

& I. Co. (1898) 186 Pa. 28, 40 Atl. 287; Strauss v. Haberman Mfg. Co. (1897) 23 App. Div. 1, 48 N. Y. Supp. 425.

It follows, therefore, that in cases where the injured employee is an infant or inexperienced, the rule as to fellow servants "only holds good when it appears that such employee has been properly instructed by his employer as to the dangers of his employment, or has acquired knowledge of such dangers from other sources" (Jones v. Florence Min. Co. [1886] 66 Wis. 268, 57 Am. Rep. 269, 28 N. W. 207); and that the mere fact that a defect in a machine is due to the fault of a coemployee will not absolve a master from the duty of instructing a servant, where the danger resulting from the defect is one which is not within his comprehension. Bjbjlan v. Woonsocket Rubber Co. (1893) 164 Mass. 214, 41 N. E. 265.

Ordinarily the employee who was in control of the injured servant will be regarded as the person upon whom, as the master's agent, the duty of instruction devolved. It was doubtless this customary apportionment of functions which has influenced the choice of phraseology in the remark of the supreme court of Indiana that, "If the agent or servant upon whom the power to command is given exercises the power, and fails to discharge the obligation, to the hurt of the servant who is without fault, the failure is that of the master, and he must respond." Atlas Engine Works v. Randall (1885) 100 Ind. 296, 50 Am. Rep. 798.

As in the case of other absolute duties the control exercised by the employee upon whom devolved the function of giving instruction may be of such a character that he is a vice principal simply by virtue of his position of superiority. Wherever the delinquent is deemed to be a representative of the master on this ground, the liability of the master may, it is obvious, be referred either to the theory that the duty of instruction is nondelegable, or to the theory that the function of instruction is one of those which are official in the sense explained in the note to O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900; Minn.) 51 L. R. A. pp. 584 et seq. Thus, in a state where the doctrine of departmental control is applied, that one has power to employ and discharge laborers, and is the foreman in his department, has the duty of the master devolved on him to instruct employees as to the danger of the employment. St. Smith Oil Co. v. Slover (1893) 58 Ark. 168, 24 S. W. 106.

Similarly, in courts where vice principalship is inferred from the mere exercise of control, the master is deemed answerable for the failure of controlling employees to instruct the subordinates. Norton v. Volks (1895) 153 Ill. 402, 41 N. E. 1085; Alton Paving, Bldg. & Fire Brick Co. v. Hudson (1897) 74 Ill. App. 612, Affirmed in (1898) 176 Ill. 270, 52 N. E. 256; Consolidated Coal Co. v. Wombacher (1890) 134 Ill. 57, 24 N. E. 627.

In another state, where the effect of vesting a superior servant with the power of employing and discharging his subordinates is to make him the master's alter ego as to them, it has been held that the superior servant is none the less a vice principal in respect to the duty of instruction because the employing and discharging are subject to the consent and approval of the superintendent. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Hinzle (1891) 82 Tex. 623, 18 S. W. 631, where the plaintiff was ordered to paint cars without being instructed as to a rule requiring men working on side tracks to set out signal flags.

Indeed, a third basis of liability is predicable in such cases, since an order to do work for which the subordinate is unfitted by reason of his ignorance is itself a negligent act of a manifestly official character, and it is therefore not necessary to rely upon a specific duty of instruction. See, for example, Missouri P. R. Co. v. Perego (1887) 36 Kan. 424, 14 Pac. 7, where the court, while advertent to the duty to instruct an inexperienced boy, seems also to consider the defendant liable on the ground that the foreman was negligent in directing the boy to obey an unskilled mechanic in the performance of work which demanded expert knowledge.

Under the general rule stated above, the superior employee will necessarily be treated as the representative of the master as to the duty of instruction, even though he may be, for other purposes, a mere servant in the jurisdiction where the cause of action arises.

The master having subjected the servant to the command of another without information or caution with respect to all such obligations as the master owes, the other stands in the master's place; and this is so notwithstanding the two servants are, as regards the common employment, fellow servants. Atlas Engine Works v. Randall (1885) 100 Ind. 293, 50 Am. Rep. 798. See also Olsen v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1888) 38 Minn. 117, 35 N. W. 866 (foreman of gang shoveling snow,—vice principal in regard to the duty of notifying his subordinates of rules); Bjbljan v. Woonsocket Rubber Co. (1895) 164 Mass. 214, 41 N. E. 265 (man in charge of machine like that which plaintiff was handling, vice principal when deputed by the foreman to instruct the plaintiff); Wallace v. Standard Oil Co. (1895) 66 Fed. 260; Klochinski v. Shores Lumber Co. (1896) 93 Wis. 417, 67 N. W. 934; Camp v. Hall (1897) 39 Fla. 535, 22 So. 792; Neillon v. Marinette & M. Paper Co. (1890) 75 Wis. 579, 44 N. W. 772 (foreman); Strauss v. Haberman Mfg. Co. (1897) 23 App. Div. 1, 48 N. Y. Supp. 425 (foreman); O'Connor v. Barker (1898) 25 App. Div. 121, 49 N. Y. Supp. 211 (floor foreman in factory).

The doctrine which exempts the master from liability arising out of the negligence of fellow servants is based upon the assumption by the servant of the ordinary risks of his employment, but has no application to risks which are not contemplated by him in entering upon the service. Burke v. Anderson (1895) 16 C. C. A. 442, 34 U. S. App. 182, 69 Fed. 814 (where the explosion of a stick of dynamite under a blow from the pick of a common laborer who had been set to work after a blast without any warning as to the possibility of peril from unexploded shots was held to be an extraordinary risk).

The failure of an agent to instruct a fellow servant as to his duties naturally results in putting an incompetent employee in a position in which his want of skill will be dangerous to his collaborators. Under such circumstances it is clear that the liability of the master may be referred to his breach of either one of two non-delegable obligations. Such was the situation in Sullivan v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1900) 58 App. Div. 89, 65 N. Y. Supp. 842.

As there is no duty to instruct a servant as to the special dangers of work which is outside the scope of his original employment and to which his superior has no authority to assign him, the negligence of the superior in ordering him to perform such work is that of a fellow servant merely. In such a case the immunity of the master is obviously the result of a consideration which renders it wholly unnecessary to advert to, and impossible to rely upon, the nondelegable quality of the duty of instruction. Crown v. Orr (1893) 140 N. Y. 450, 35 N. E. 648. Contrast with this case Union P. R. Co. v. Fort (1873) 17 Wall. 553, 21 L. ed. 739, where the authority of the foreman in the premises seems to have been conceded.

arises where an uninstructed servant undertakes a duty which he was not authorized to undertake.

Plaintiff, a street-car driver, in crossing an excavation, was obliged to unhitch his team, and leave the car, under the control of the conductor, to come down the grade of its own weight, past the excavation. In getting the team around the excavation, plaintiff stumbled and fell across the track, and the conductor, who had just been hired, and had received no instructions as to the use of the brake, turned it the wrong way, whereby the car ran over plaintiff and injured him. It was shown on the trial that the contractor making the excavation provided men to push the cars going up grade past the excavation. Held, that this fact did not tend to show that it was not the duty of the conductor to take charge of the car while coming down grade. Sullivan v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1900) 53 App. Div. 89, 65 N. Y. Supp. 842.

o. Duty to impart information as to permanent dangers superadded to the environment after the work has begun.

Some courts have deferred to the force of the consideration that there is apparently no logical ground upon which it is possible to ascribe a nondelegable quality to the duty discussed in the preceding section and at the same time to refuse to predicate such a quality of the duty to imparting to a servant such information as is proper under the circumstances with regard to new dangers which are of such a nature that his safety will be continuously imperiled until the normal conditions of his environment have been restored. A master, it is held, cannot delegate to another, even though he be a fellow servant, the duty of notifying his servant of increased danger so as to absolve himself from liability for failure to communicate it. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Laack (1892) 143 Ill. 242, 18 L. R. A. 215, 32 N. E. 285 (negligence of persons who, under a license from the master, put in new burners in a brick kiln for the purpose of testing their advantages).

The rule applies where the increase of danger arises from some extrinsic alteration in the character of the environment itself. See the case last cited, and also Cerillos Coal R. Co. v. Deserant (1897) 9 N. M. 49, 49 Pac. 807 (a fire boss in a mine is a vice principal as to the performance of the duty of informing miners where they may work without being endangered by accumulations of gas); Elledge v. National City & O. R. Co. (1893) 100 Cal. 282, 34 Pac. 720 (foreman supervising work of excavation held to be a vice principal in regard to warning laborers as to any special danger of a subsidence).

A master is liable for the negligence of his "walking boss" in failing to notify one of a gang of men who were directed to help in putting out a fire that the stump of a tree had been so burned at the bottom that it was likely to fall. Maltby v. Belden (1899) 45 App. Div. 384, 60 N. Y. Supp. 824. See also Boelter v. Ross Lumber Co. (1899) 103 Wis. 324, 79 N. W. 243.

The testimony of the foreman of a factory that a trapdoor in a passageway was used on an average about three times a week, and from five to ten minutes at a time, justifies an inference that it was expected to be used, and that the act of a servant in opening it was not unauthorized in such a sense as to prevent recovery from the employer by a fellow servant injured by falling through the trapdoor, upon the ground of the employer's negligence in maintaining the door in the passageway and failing to notify him thereof. Johnson v. Field-Thurber Co. (1898) 171 Mass. 481, 51 N. E. 18.

In Smith v. Oxford Iron Co. (1880) 42 N. J.

L. 467, 36 Am. Rep. 535, it appeared that one Scranton, the president of the defendant company, to whose care was committed the superintendence of the business of the corporation, introduced the use of giant powder. It was clearly shown that it was a highly dangerous explosive, and that the proper manner of using it was not made known to the plaintiff, although printed instructions were in the possession of the company. The court said: "Before allowing this new compound to be introduced, it was a duty which the company owed to the plaintiff to ascertain and make known its properties and the mode of using it, either to the plaintiff himself or those under whose direction he worked. The obligation to do so rested upon Scranton, as the head officer of the company, and his neglect in that respect was the neglect of the company itself. It was gross negligence in the company to furnish such an article for a laborer's use without giving him the requisite information. Whether the company was aware of its dangerous quality, or furnished it for use without having taken steps to obtain such knowledge, it is equally liable. It was a duty which the company, through Scranton, was bound to perform, to see that such reasonable care as the exigency of the case demanded, was taken, and to impart to the subordinates full information as to the manner of applying the new compound, before placing it in the hands of an ignorant laborer. This obligation resting on the company itself, the president could not shift its liability by referring the matter to one of his subordinates."

It would seem that, if there was any object in doing so, all the cases in which the master has been held liable for the failure of a servant to discover defects in an instrumentality which he has to supervise might be brought under this principle.

The rule against delegation of power is equally applicable where the servant has been transferred to a new place of work where he will be exposed to some abnormal risk of the kind now under discussion.

In McMahon v. Ida Min. Co. (1897) 95 Wis. 308, 70 N. W. 478, it was held that a master is "not to set a man at work among latent and extraordinary dangers, of which the employee knows nothing and which he cannot ascertain by experience or observation;" and that "in taking the plaintiff from one part of the mine in which he had been at work and setting him at work in a different place," and not warning him as to certain unexploded blasts, the shift boss was plainly and palpably acting in the capacity of the master.

This phase of the master's obligation to warn was recently considered at great length in Carlson v. Northwestern Teleph. Exchange Co. (1896) 63 Minn. 428, 65 N. W. 914, where the court reasoned thus: "If the nature and magnitude of the master's work, whether it be that of construction or otherwise, and the number of men engaged in its execution, are such that the exercise of ordinary care for the safety and protection of the workmen from unusual and unnecessary dangers requires that they be given reasonable orders, and that they be not ordered from one part of the work to another, without warning, into places of unusual danger and risks, which are not obvious to the senses and known to them, but which might be ascertained by the master by a proper inspection, the absolute duty rests upon the master to give such reasonable orders. Considerations of justice and a sound public policy impose this duty upon the master as such, which he cannot delegate so as to relieve himself from the consequences of a negligent discharge of it. Where a large number of men are employed upon the same work, it is essential that reasonable orders, regulating their conduct, and assigning to them proper places in which to work, should be given. It is the duty and the right of the master to give orders and direct the places where his servants shall work. Their duty is instant and absolute obedience, unless it be obvious to them that such obedience will expose them to unusual dangers. Despatch, discipline, and the safety of person and property in the execution of work imperatively require that the master should order and the servant obey. It would be practically impossible to carry on a work of any magnitude on any other base. A workman, when ordered from one part of the work to another, cannot be allowed to stop, examine, and experiment for himself, in order to ascertain if the place assigned to him is a safe one; and therefore in obeying the order, while he assumes obvious and ordinary risks, he has a right to rely upon a faithful discharge of the master's duty to use ordinary care to warn and protect him against unusual dangers. Any rule or doctrine which deprives the workman of this right and protection when the master delegates the power and duty of giving such orders to a subordinate, no matter how high or low his rank or grade, is unsupported by reason, violates all considerations of justice, and is not supported by the weight of authority." The standpoint of the court will be made somewhat clearer by quoting the following passage from the concurring opinion of Mitchell, J.: "The principle which this court has always announced as the test is that it is not the mere rank or grade of the superior employee, but the nature of the duty or service which he was performing, which determines the question; that, whenever a master delegates to another the performance of a duty which he owes absolutely to his servants, or which would fall within the line of his duty, as master, if personally present, then, in the performance of such acts such other person would be, as to other servants, a vice principal, and not a fellow servant. Whether we have always correctly applied this test to the facts is another question. For example, in hiring and discharging workmen the foreman in the present case would represent the master, and his negligence in the premises would be chargeable to the master. So, also, in the matter of selecting or inspecting implements and other instrumentalities for the performance of the work, assuming that this duty had been delegated to him. And where, as in this case, he had been given entire control of the work, and of all the workmen engaged in it, with absolute and supreme authority to give them orders how to do the work and where to work, I think that, on exactly the same principle, in giving these orders, which the workmen were bound to obey, he represented the master, and was performing a duty which would have devolved on the master if personally present."

In Burke v. Anderson (1895) 16 C. C. A. 442, 34 U. S. App. 132, 69 Fed. 814, where a superintendent of the work of excavating for a railway was held to be a vice principal as regards his negligence in failing to notify a laborer that a portion of the explosives has not been exploded, the court said: "The master provides the place for his servant to work, and if his acts create a special danger he is not alone chargeable with the positive duty to exercise the utmost care and every available precaution against possible injury to those who are to work there, but, if danger impends, notwithstanding the precautions taken, he is further obligated to give due information and timely warning to those in his service who are ignorant of its extent before calling upon them to incur the risk. In respect of the employment of the plaintiff and the directions for his work, it is unquestionable and conceded that the superintendent represented the master as vice principal. In the same relation he is chargeable with knowledge of the danger in using the explosives, and with the duty to protect employees and notify them of risk. If the plaintiff was not informed of the peril which compliance with the order involved, or if it was not clearly apparent, the risk thus created cannot be held to have been contemplated in the service in which he engaged, and therefore it was not one assumed by him in his employment. The instructions requested on behalf of the principal defendant, and the theory of the whole defense as well, rest upon the claim that the operation of blasting was common labor, and not the work of a superintendent or vice principal, that its performance by this superintendent was in the character of a fellow servant, and the master was not liable for any neglect therein beyond the exercise of ordinary care in selecting his servants. In the same connection it is argued that the use and care of the explosives was not a personal duty of the master. Whether these claims could be maintained by the master in any case in which he brings into his work the dangerous means which produce injury, and whether the rule of strict care does not impose a positive obligation which he cannot evade by delegating the performance, are questions of interest, but they do not require consideration here. It is sufficient that the risk was created by the master or for his purposes; that there is legitimate finding by the jury of negligence on the part of those engaged in the performance, causing the injury; and finally that the plaintiff was ignorant of the risk and had not assumed it. The doctrine which exempts the master from liability arising out of the negligence of fellow servants is based upon the assumption by the servant of the ordinary risks of his employment, in which the negligence of fellow servants is included, but it has no application to risks which are not contemplated by him in entering upon the service (Northern P. R. Co. v. Hamby [1894] 154 U. S. 349, 357, 38 L. ed. 1009, 1012, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 983), and certainly cannot govern for this extraordinary risk interposed by the master without warning." See also McMahon v. Ida Min. Co. (1897) 95 Wis. 308, 70 N. W. 478 (without warning miner sent to work in a place where there were a number of unexploded blasts).

In some instances it is difficult to say whether, from a purely logical standpoint, the liability of the master should be referred to this rule, or to that which requires him to answer for the negligence of persons deputed to carry out regulations. See III. 1, supra. The intimate association between the two conceptions is especially manifest in cases turning upon the master's obligation to control the movements of trains. Moon v. Richmond & A. R. Co. (1884) 78 Va. 745, 49 Am. Rep. 401 (section foreman failed to signal train to stop at a place where track had become dangerous).

The same state of facts appeared also in Torian v. Richmond & A. R. Co. (1887) 84 Va. 192, 4 S. E. 339, where we find the court laying down the law thus: "It was the duty of the defendant company . . . to use all reasonable precautions, including necessary signals to moving trains, essential to the protection of the lives and limbs, not only of employees, but to the protection of all persons lawfully on its road. The defendant company, by and through the negligence of its agent, Herndon, in failing to signal the approaching train, and warn it of the danger in its path, was guilty of culpable negligence which caused the accident that resulted in the death of the plaintiff's intestate, and for that negligence and that result the company is liable in damages. That negligence was the proximate cause of the death of plaintiff's intestate, who was not the coemployee of Herndon, by whose negligence the accident was caused in the sense which relieves the employer from liability for injuries to one servant by and through the negligent act or omission of his fellow servant."

In Turner v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (1895) 49 W. Va. 675, 23 S. E. 83, it was held that though in some respects the engineer and fireman of a special engine are fellow servants of a section hand, yet, in giving him warning of the use of the track by a special train they discharge a nonassignable personal or positive duty of the railroad company in its corporate capacity. The court said: "It has been well said that it would be a monstrous doctrine to hold that a railroad company could frame such schedules as would inevitably, or even probably, result in collisions or loss of life. Lewis v. Seifert (1887) 116 Pa. 647, 11 Atl. 514. Having prepared and promulgated its schedule, it must adhere to it, and if it makes a change or violates such schedule, it is its positive duty to notify all who may be affected thereby of such change. When, in contravention of its schedule, it sends a 'wild engine' over its track unexpectedly, it is in duty bound to warn all its employees who are rightfully on and using the track about its business, whether in charge of engine, train or hand car, of the change in the schedule, and if it intrusts this duty to others, by bell, whistle, or otherwise, it makes such others its vice principals to that extent, and if they fail to discharge this duty the company must answer for their negligence unless it be shown that the injured person contributed thereto. For instance, if the company had failed to notify Foreman Alley, by bell, whistle, or otherwise, of the presence of a special train or obstruction on the track, and he had been injured thereby, he could recover unless the defendant showed that he was under express instructions to be on the lookout for such special trains, and, as a matter of precaution, to flag around curves and through cuts. In such case he would fail, not because of being a fellow servant with the engineer, but from contributing to his negligence. The company must protect its employees from all dangers created by itself or its authorized agents or agencies which such employees cannot themselves foresee, or, by the use of ordinary prudence, avoid. For it must furnish them a safe place to work. To send 'wild engines' and trains without any manner of warning or precaution over tracks already rightfully occupied by other employees is negligence in the highest degree criminal, in utter disregard of human life or limb, and worthy of the severest penalties the law can possibly inflict; and it is made less criminal by the degree of precaution taken to give the necessary warning, and only becomes excusable when the measures adopted are sufficient to protect such employees from threatened danger, provided they are free from fault themselves."

The advantage which the servant receives from the rule is, however, greatly curtailed by the construction which has been put upon the doctrine as to details of work (see, especially, V. f. infra). Some of the cases cited in this subdivision would undoubtedly have been decided differently in some jurisdictions.

p. Duty to warn as to dangers of the transitory class occasionally supervening during the progress of the work.

In some instances the master's liability for the failure of one employee to warn another as to a peril of the merely transitory class may be predicated on the ground that the dereliction of duty was an official act of an agent who was a vice principal by virtue of his rank as a general or departmental manager. The general principle applicable to such a case has been stated thus: "It is a wrong on the part of the agent having the right to order a servant to do certain specific work to increase the peril of the service by his own negligence. The employee acting under the specific order has a right to assume, in the absence of warning or notice, that his superior who gave the order would not, by his own negligence, make the work unsafe." Taylor v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. (1899) 121 Ind. 124, 6 L. R. A. 584, 22 N. E. 876. See also the note to O'Neil v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900: Minn.) 51 L. R. A. 592, 593.

But wherever there is no such superiority of rank that the plaintiff must rely solely on the character of the negligent act itself as a ground of recovery, it seems clear that, in the absence of some special consideration bringing the facts within the domain of some duty conceded to be nondelegable, the master cannot be compelled to indemnify a servant for injuries caused by this kind of negligence, without breaking in upon the principle that the master is, at all events, not liable for any dangers which are due to the manner in which the servants themselves deal with instrumentalities which are intrinsically safe and suitable. Such a case is presented where the real gravamen of the action is the failure to conduct the work upon a safe system. Grace & H. Co. v. Kennedy (1900) 40 C. C. A. 60, 99 Fed. 679, Affirming (1899) 92 Fed. 116, where a person employing men to work on tall timbers above a sidewalk, which are required to be supported by guys across the street, was held liable for his failure to furnish watchmen to warn drivers in charge of vehicles upon the street to avoid the guys, so as to be liable for the fall of a workman caused by a vehicle striking a guy, although fellow workmen in moving the guys as the work progresses are also negligent in placing it where it will be struck by passing wagons. In the lower court the rationale of the decision was that the "place was made unsafe by the lack of warning with which the work in which the plaintiff was engaged had nothing to do," and it was observed that the duty of providing for the safety of the place of work rests as a nondelegable obligation upon the master "except as it may be changed by the progress of the work itself." In the court of appeals the liability was predicated rather upon the lack of a proper system, and it was laid down that the master cannot escape liability under the rule that the duty of the master to provide safe places does not apply where the place, originally furnished is safe, and becomes unsafe in the progress of the work, or because of the manner in which the work is done, since it cannot be said that the place (the street) originally furnished was safe unless it was protected by danger signals or watchmen.

Under the theory that the master's duty to enforce rules is nondelegable, it is also possible to justify the decision of the Indiana court of appeals which has also held that a railroad company is liable to a car repairer for personal injuries received by him while making repairs, where a brakeman to whom the company has entrusted the duty of notifying the workmen that a switch engine is about to enter upon the tracks fails to give such notice, if a rule of the company requires the notice to be given, and does not require the repairer to take any steps for his own protection. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Holcomb (1894) 9 Ind. App. 198, 36 N. E. 39.

case in which the master has been held liable on the broad ground that he must answer for the negligence of a servant charged with the function of warning other employees that the instrumentalities are about to be used in a way which will render their environment unsafe for a brief period of uncertain duration. In holding that the failure of a quarry foreman to give warning of a blast, as it was his duty to do, in time to permit the workmen to get out of danger, is imputable to the employer, and is not one of the risks assumed by the employee, the result being the same whether the negligence arose from a defective system with reference to warnings, or from the foreman's failure to properly observe such system, the court rejected the theory of the defendant that the giving of the warning was only incidental to the foreman's work in preparing the blast and lighting the fuse, saying: "When we consider the general duty owed by an employer to his employees to exercise reasonable care that the place where he sets them to work shall be kept safe (Van Steenburgh v. Thornton (1895) 58 N. J. L. 160, 33 Atl. 380), the propriety of including therein the duty of giving warning in such circumstances as those now before us becomes at once apparent. The danger of blasting was one frequently recurring, and its occurrence could always be foreseen, not by the workmen scattered about the quarry, but by any person charged with the duty of watching for it. If the danger was not foreseen, and the proper warning given, the quarry became an unsafe place for the workmen, but it was made reasonably safe if such warning was given. It seems clearly to follow that on him whose duty it was to take care that the place was kept safe was cast the duty of giving timely warning. We conclude, therefore, that it was part of the defendant's duty to the plaintiff that proper care should be exercised in giving warning of an expected blast." Belleville Stone Co. v. Mooney (1897) 61 N. J. L. 263, 39 L. R. A. 834, 39 Atl. 764, Affirming 60 N. J. L. 323, 38 Atl. 836.

Considering the consistent rigor with which the doctrine of common employment has usually been construed in New Jersey to the servant's disadvantage, the attitude of the court in this particular instance is somewhat surprising.

q. Duty to inspect instrumentalities; generally.

Since neither the duty of seeing that the instrumentalities of work, as originally supplied, satisfy the legal standard of safety, nor the duty of seeing that they continue while in use to satisfy that standard, can be adequately performed without a proper examination of the subject-matter, it would seem that in any case in which an absolute quality is ascribed to these duties, a like quality ought, as a necessary logical consequence, to be ascribed to the duty of examination both as respects the time when the instrumentalities are first furnished, and as regards the period during which they remain in use.

But a comparison of the decisions cited in the following subdivision, with those noted in III. d, supra, and in VII. a, b, infra, shows that the courts have not always deferred to the logical force of this consideration.

r. Duty to inspect instrumentalities at the time they are first brought into use.

So far as regards the original condition of such instrumentalities as are furnished in a completed condition an entirely symmetrical doctrine prevails. If a master undertakes to manufacture and supply instrumentalities to his servant, he must, at his peril, see that they are properly inspected before being brought into use. See note to Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines (1898; Mich.) 41 L. R. A. 70.

Inspection to discover whether an appliance is defective is as much a part of the work of furnishing safe appliances as reparation after the defect is discovered. Eaton v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1900) 163 N. Y. 391, 57 N. E. 609.

So, also, if articles which are liable to deteriorate with the lapse of time are stored after being purchased, and then brought into use as the necessities of the work may demand, the person who has them under his charge is regarded as the master's representative in respect to the duty of seeing that none which have become unfit for use are turned over to the servants. Nord Deutscher Lloyd S. S. Co. v. Ingebragsten (1894) 57 N. J. L. 402, 31 Atl. 619 (storekeeper delivered a rusty cable to a stevedore).

It has been held that a railway company is liable for an injury to a brakeman caused by his being thrown off the car and under the wheels by the negligent loading of smokestacks on such car by a station agent intrusted with such loading, where the brakeman was not guilty of negligence contributing to the injury. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Seeley (1893) 54 Kan. 21, 37 Pac. 104. The court said: "An authority is cited to the effect that, where the company has employed a competent inspector to see that the cars are properly loaded and in good condition, it cannot be held liable for the negligence of the inspector in failing to observe that the car was improperly loaded. Dewey v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. (1893) 97 Mich. 343, 22 L. R. A. 292, 16 L. R. A. 342, 52 N. W. 942, 56 N. W. 756. This authority is not satisfactory to us nor in line with the decisions that have been cited. We are unable to see any reason for a distinction between the preparation and inspection of the car itself as a fit instrumentality to be placed in a train and the preparation and inspection of a loaded car to be placed in the train for transportation. Each is an instrumentality to be used in connection with the services necessary to be performed by the trainmen in its transportation, and no distinction between them is seen, so far as the obligation of the company or the safety of the employees engaged in handling it are concerned. The inspection in either case is made with reference to the same end and the person to whom this duty is delegated stands in the place of the company, and the latter is responsible for his acts." Contrast IV. o. 3, infra.

The doctrine that the master is liable for a defect in one of the constituent parts of a machine which is substituted for a discarded one obviously involves, in the present connection, the corollary that he is liable for the careless performance of the duty of inspecting the new materials thus introduced into the machine. Tov v. United States Cartridge Co. (1893) 159 Mass. 313, 34 N. E. 461. See extract in III. f, supra.

On the other hand, the effect of the decisions cited in the note to Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines (1898; Mich.) 41 L. R. A. pp. 71 et seq. is that, to the extent there shown, the master is not required to answer for the inadequacy of an inspection where the person who made, or ought to have made, it was a manufacturer or dealer on whose skill and judgment he was entitled to rely. Compare also II. h, 1, supra.

a. Duty to inspect instrumentalities during the time they are kept in use.

Except in so far as the servant's rights of recovery may be limited by the application of the doctrine as to details of work, the duty of inspection is by most courts treated as nondelegable. The effect of this doctrine will be explained in subtitle VII. infra. At present it will be sufficient to say that, as a general rule, the duty of inspection is absolute in so far as it has relation to intrinsic defects, and delegable in so far as it has relation to defects which arise in the daily use of the instrumentalities, and are of such a nature that the necessary remedy can without difficulty be applied by the servants themselves. A differentiation based upon a theory so extremely vague as this is naturally anything but satisfactory, and a comparison of the cases cited in the following paragraphs with those tabulated in VII. b, infra, shows that between the two zones of facts with respect to which the theory yields definite and logical results there lies an extensive debatable ground which forms the subject of decisions reflecting little more than the tendency of the various courts to favor either the master or the servant in the choice of the particular principle to which the rights of the parties shall be referred.

The following cases were decided on the broad ground that in the language of the court in Bailey v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. (1893) 139 N. Y. 302, 34 N. E. 918, "proper inspection to discover defects is a part of the master's duty." Texas & P. R. Co. v. Barrett (1895) 14 C. C. A. 373, 30 U. S. App. 190, 67 Fed. 214. Affirmed in (1897) 166 U. S. 617, 41 L. ed. 1136, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 707 (weakness of boiler which exploded might have been discovered by a proper test); Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Mulligan (1895) 14 C. C. A. 547, 34 U. S. App. 1, 67 Fed. 569 (engineer, charged with duty of inspecting his engine, not a fellow servant of a hostler injured by a defective footboard); Texas & P. R. Co. v. Thompson (1895) 17 C. C. A. 524, 30 U. S. App. 549, 70 Fed. 944, reiterating the doctrine of Texas & P. R. Co. v. Barrett (1895) 14 C. C. A. 373, 30 U. S. App. 190, 67 Fed. 214 (boiler exploded. Speer, D. J., dissented, but only on the ground that the theory of the defendant as to the cause of the accident had not been brought to the attention of the jury by proper instructions); Gowen v. Bush (1896) 22 C. C. A. 196, 40 U. S. App. 349, 76 Fed. 349 (employees charged with the duty of going through a mine inspecting it and seeing whether it is free from explosive gas are discharging a personal duty of the master, and are not fellow servants of a miner in that respect); Western Coal & Min. Co. v. Ingraham (1895) 17 C. C. A. 71, 36 U. S. App. 1, 70 Fed. 219 (owner of a mine cannot escape responsibility for neglect to make timely inspection of the timbers, walls, and roofs by the devolution of the duty on a competent mining boss or foreman); *McCauley v. In Tierney v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1885) 33 Minn. 311, 53 Am. Rep. 35, 23 N. W. 229, it was held that where, by a regulation governing the employees in the transfer yard of a railway company, car inspectors were required to inspect incoming cars immediately upon their arrival, and, if out of repair, to mark them "in bad order," indicating that they were to be sent to the "repair track," negligence on the part of the inspectors in failing to properly discharge this duty, by reason of which plaintiff was injured while attempting to couple a damaged car without notice, of its condition, and without fault on his part, may be imputed to the company. The court said: "In respect to patent defects in the coupling apparatus, brakes, wheels, etc., we may assume that the defendants had undertaken the duty of inspection, and intrusted it to the proper agents. As a rule, also, there is a distinction between the special duties of such persons and the service of other employees who are engaged in handling cars and operating trains. It is not the same in kind as that of the switchman, brakeman, or other operative. Wedgwood v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1878) 44 Wis. 44; Schultz v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1879) 43 Wis. 375, 4 N. W. 899. The service of the former class relates wholly to the matter of the care and repair of machinery, the use of which is attended with constant danger to other employees unless maintained in a safe condition; and they represent the master, not in the capacity of superior officers placed over other employees, but because performing the master's duty in respect to safe instrumentalities." See also III. t. infra, as to inspection of foreign cars.

In an action by an employee to recover for injuries caused by the giving way of a grab iron of a ladder on the side of the car, an instruction which deals with the method of inspection adopted by the company is properly refused, where the issue is, not whether the system of inspection was the proper one, but whether the inspectors properly executed the system. Thompson v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900) 79 Minn. 291, 82 N. W. 637.

A similar conclusion, it may be remarked, is reached under the theory that inspectors are in a different department from the servants who use the instrumentalities inspected. Thus, in one case it was laid down that the negligence of the servants of a railroad company, having charge of the inspection and repair of cars, is, as regards a brakeman, the negligence of a superior in another department. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Jackson (1870) 55 Ill. 492, 8 Am. Rep. 661. In another, the conductor of a freight train was denied being a fellow servant of a car inspector by whose negligence in failing to inspect the ladder of one of the cars the former was injured. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hilliard (1896) 99 Ky. 684, 37 S. W. 75 (servants said to be "acting in different spheres").

The nature of the liability imputed to the master for negligence in regard to inspection is sometimes defined by saying that the employment of a competent inspector of its appliances does not relieve the master from liability for injuries resulting from defects in the appliances, which would have been discovered by a reasonably careful inspection, but which were not in fact discovered. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Ward (1896) 147 Ind. 236, 45 N. E. 323, Rehearing denied in 147 Ind. 265, 46 N. E. 462; Following Durkin v. Sharp (1882) 88 N. Y. 225, where it was held that the inspection of a railroad track was a duty of the master, and if carelessly and negligently performed, even by a competent inspector, the master would still be liable. To excuse him from liability the track must have been carefully inspected by a competent inspector.

The sufficiency of the number of inspectors of railroad cars, and their competency, furnish no defense to an action for injuries caused by a defect which could have been detected by a proper inspection. Union P. R. Co. v. Daniels (1894) 152 U. S. 684, sub nom. Union P. R. Co. v. Snyder, 38 L. ed. 597, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 756.

Where a servant of a railroad company is injured or killed in consequence of the giving way of a defective bridge, the company cannot escape liability from the fact that the bridge was constructed properly in the first place, and it employed skillful and competent subordinates to inspect and repair its bridges. Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Conroy (1878) 68 Ill. 569. For other examples of the same form of statement, see Egan v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. (1896) 12 App. Div. 556, 42 N. Y. Supp. 188; Bushby v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1887) 107 N. Y. 874, 14 N. E. 407; Elmer v. Locke (1883) 135 Mass. 575; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Pearcy (1891) 128 Ind. 197, 27 N. E. 479; Texas & P. R. Co. v. O'Fiel (1890) 78 Tex. 486, 15 S. W. 33; Indiana Iron Co. v. Cray (1897) 19 Ind. App. 565, 48 N. E. 803 (facts indicated that a proper inspection would have disclosed the danger).

The master will not be allowed to escape on the theory that the person who actually made the negligent inspection was not the employee appointed by him to discharge the duty of inspection (Sabine & E. T. R. Co. v. Ewing [1892] 1 Tex. Civ. App. 531, 21 S. W. 700); and if he chooses to devolve the duty of inspecting an instrumentality upon the employee whose function it is to use it for the purpose of his work, and provides no other method of inspection, he must respond in damages for the negligence of the employee in continuing to use the instrumentality after he has learned that it is dangerously defective, and has had an opportunity of discarding it or reporting its condition to the agent of the master whose duty it is to make the needful repairs.

In McDonald v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1895) 108 Mich. 7, 65 N. W. 597, a railway company was held liable to one of its brakemen for an injury received through the failure of the engine to respond promptly to the airbrake, which defect was known to the engineer, who continued to use the engine after knowing of the defect. The court said: "The record shows that there was no provision for inspection other than inspection by the engineer operating the train. He was expected to inspect his engine at all practicable times, and to report defects. This was no more than common prudence dictates should be required of all operatives of railway trains, and it is to be considered as a part of their duties in and about the operation of their trains; and this is as true when the railroad company makes no other provision for inspection as when it has another regular inspector. Such inspection, in the ordinary operation of the road, is the act of a fellow servant, as between the engineer and brakeman, and, as between them, does not constitute the engineer a representative of the master. To say that an engineer who should err in attempting to make the next station after his engine became broken acted as the representative of his master, thus holding the latter liable to the fireman, who was injured, would be carrying the rule too far. An unreported injury of the brakes, known to the brakeman, would be another illustration. The duty that the master owes to his patrons requires vigilance and care upon the part of the crew, and the master should be permitted to require it 54 L. R. A.

without subjecting himself to all the consequences following negligence by an inspector proper. . . . But if the company makes no other provision for inspection, and chooses to rely upon the reports of its men, deferring repairs until breaks occur, or until the operators in due course of business report defects, we must either say that it has neglected the duty of inspection altogether, or that it has imposed one of its duties upon its operatives, and that it does not fall within the limits of fellow service, or that it may avoid the duty which the law imposes by invoking the rule of fellow servant. So long as operatives do report, and the master repairs promptly, the jury may properly say that there is no negligence on the part of the master; but, if defects are not seasonably repaired, the master neglects a duty, and we should not split hairs to determine whether it was his personal carelessness, or that of the agent whom he appoints to apprise him of the impending duty to repair, although such agent be a fellow operative of one who is injured by reason of a want of seasonable repair." The reasoning in this case seems to be sounder and more in conformity with general principles than that of the following passage in Theleman v. Moeller (1887) 73 Iowa, 108, 34 N. W. 765. The court said: "It is the rule of this court that an employee cannot, in an action against his employer, recover for the negligence of a co-employee engaged in the prosecution of a common business. But this rule does not extend to an employee who is charged with no other duty than to inspect the machinery, in the operation of which the injury occurs. Brann v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1880) 53 Iowa, 595, 36 Am. Rep. 243, 6 N. W. 5. But the engineer, it will be seen from the statement of the evidence just made, was not confined by his duty to the mere inspection of the machinery. He had it in charge, was required to see that it was in good condition, and to repair it when broken or defective. These duties were not separated from the operation of the machinery. The engineer and plaintiff together operated it. The engine furnished the motive power propelling the saw, which did the work of sawing,—the very purpose for which both engine and saw were used. The saw could not be operated without the engine. The engineer was engaged in operating the saw. He was therefore a co-employee of plaintiff in the common business of both."

There is no reason why the engineer should not be regarded as occupying the dual position of a vice principal and of a mere servant. See II. k. supra.

The antithesis between inspection which concerns matters of detail and inspection which has relation to intrinsic defects is the basis of the decisions cited below. Mayer v. Liebmann (1897) 16 App. Div. 54, 44 N. Y. Supp. 1067 (owners of a brewery held liable for an injury to an employee caused by the fall of a beer keg through a run in which the kegs were lowered into a cellar, resulting from the rivet holes in the rods and brackets of the run becoming enlarged by use and rust, where the defect could have been discovered by proper examination).

In Fox v. Le Comte (1896) 2 App. Div. 61, 37 N. Y. Supp. 316, the court remarked: "As to the defendant's negligence, it is undisputed that if the plunger moved without pressure on the treadle, the press was defective. It was alleged that though this was the case the defendant had no knowledge of the fact. It was not necessary that the defendant should personally have such knowledge. The repair of the press was not a mere detail of the work, as in Webber v. Piper (1888) 109 N. Y. 496, 17 N. E. 216, but a part of the master's duty to use reasonable care to provide safe appliances for his servants. This duty was committed to the machinist, but, being the master's duty, the machinist in the discharge of it was not a coservant, but represented the master. For his neglect the master was liable."

The improper adjustment of a brake rod constitutes a "defective appliance," and not a mere "neglect or failure in the detail of the work" within the rule relating to the liability of the master for defects in appliances, where, according to the regular course of the business, it was the duty of inspectors to make the adjustment, and not the duty of the train employees. Woods v. Long Island R. Co. (1896) 11 App. Div. 16, 42 N. Y. Supp. 140.

In Bushby v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1885) 37 Hun, 104, it was argued by the defendant's counsel that, as car stakes are uniformly furnished by the shipper the defendant was under no obligation in respect to them, except to inspect them, and that that duty was performed in the present case; but the court held that the defendant could not vest itself of the duty it owed to its employees by leaving that duty to be performed by the shipper, or by making an arrangement with him whereby he undertook to perform it. This view was adopted by the court of appeals in (1887) 107 N. Y. 374, 14 N. E. 407, Danforth, J., remarking, the defect complained of was not in the loading, but in the preparation of the car to receive the load,—that is, in the car as a "lumber car."

Compare also McIntyre v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1895) 163 Mass. 189, 39 N. E. 1012, where the defendant was held liable for defective side stakes, the court saying: "The case is not one where an implement designed for repeated use has been weakened and made unfit for further service by such use; it is rather the case of the furnishing of an implement never fit for use, and evidently unfit. Such a stake could not, without negligence, have been placed where stakes were kept to be used for the purpose to which this was put. We need not inquire whether, if it had been taken from a number of sound and suitable stakes provided for that purpose by a workman whose duty it was to equip the car, the careless taking of this stake would have been negligence of a fellow workman the risk of which the plaintiff must stand, or whether negligence in equipping the car with stakes is something for which the defendant is responsible, whether it intrusts the work to one person or another."

A master cannot escape liability to servants for the nonperformance of his duty to use reasonable care that overhead shafting shall be supported and maintained so as not to endanger their safety, by delegating its performance to an engineer placed in charge of the machinery in the factory. Hustis v. James A. Banister Co. (1899) 63 N. J. L. 465, 43 Atl. 651. The court disposed as follows of the contention that the case fell within the distinction drawn in certain cases cited, viz., that inspection or repair incidental to use by a servant of machinery or implements, is the servant's not the master's, duty: "Of negligence in the performance of such incidental duty, other servants, as in case of any negligence of their fellows, take the risk. To illustrate, an engineer while running his locomotive must not only watch its steam-gauge and the working of its mechanism, but may also need to have resort to his repair-kit. For neglect of such duties his master is not liable to other servants in common employment with him. Simple or complex, the use of any instrumentality of human action involves some inspection, and may involve repair because of that very use. It is with such inspection and such repair only that the law charges the servant to the 54 L. R. A.

relief of the master, and it is plain that the use must be direct. The engineer runs, and therefore must inspect, his engine, but not the shafting or machinery to which he transmits power. The turner runs, and therefore must inspect, his lathe, but not the shaft that brings him power. Inspection while in use and inspection incidental to use are not convertible expressions. There may be inspection of moving mechanism devolving on no servant, but on the master. If so, negligence in that inspection or failure to properly repair defects discovered will be chargeable on the master, although he may select as the agent to perform his duty a fellow servant of those to whom he owes such duty. The test is always whether or not the duty left unperformed was the master's duty. In the case in hand it was properly left to the jury to say whether reasonable care for the safety of the workmen in the defendant's factory required inspection and repair of the line of shafting that fell and injured the plaintiff. If so, that duty could not be discharged by delegation except at the master's peril, although the agent chosen was a fellow servant of the plaintiff. Properly this case should not be considered as one involving the operation of machinery, but as one involving a place of working. That the support of a suspended piece of iron was rendered precarious by its motion in connection with machinery is an immaterial circumstance. The question for the jury was whether or not the defendant used reasonable care that what it set up over the heads of its servants should not fall down upon them.

In other cases the consideration upon which stress is laid is the analogous one that the defective appliance was permanent, and not one merely for temporary use. Dougherty v. Milliken (1898) 26 App. Div. 386, 49 N. Y. Supp. 905 (duty of an employer to see that an eyebolt to which a guy holding a permanent derrick in position is fastened is a reasonably safe and proper appliance, cannot be delegated to a servant).

When a spur track is constructed for permanent use, it is an instrument for the use of those who conduct and manage the trains, and the liability of the master is referred to the principle that he cannot escape responsibility where it is his duty to supply suitable structures, instrumentalities, or appliances by proving that he delegated to a proper agent their construction, superintendence, or repairs, and not to the rule under which it is held, in regard to temporary stagings erected for the repair or completion of buildings, that if suitable workmen and materials are provided his obligation is discharged. Elmer v. Locke (1883) 135 Mass. 575.

t. Duty to inspect instrumentalities belonging to another person, but temporarily used by the master.

As regards instrumentalities not belonging to the master, but temporarily placed under his control for the purpose of facilitating the transaction of business in which both he and the owner have a common interest, the only rational and logical doctrine seems to be, that a servant has nothing to do with the arrangements which the master may make with a third party for their mutual convenience, and should therefore be entitled to hold the master responsible for the negligent inspection of the thing so transferred in all cases in which he would have been able to recover if that thing had been owned by, or permanently in the possession of, the master. And this is the view adopted in several jurisdictions.

That a car-inspector is a vice principal, whether the cars whose condition is in question are foreign or domestic, has been declared in Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Mansberger (1893) 12 C. C. A. 574, 24 U. S. App. 551, 65 Fed. 198, rehearing denied in (1895) 14 C. C. A. 308, 24 U. S. App. 687, 67 Fed. 67; s. p. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Myers (1894) 11 C. C. A. 439, 24 U. S. App. 293, 63 Fed. 793, Disapproving the Massachusetts doctrine; Fay v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1883) 30 Minn. 231, 15 N. W. 241; Jones v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1897) 20 R. I. 212, 37 Atl. 1033; Felton v. Bullard (1899) 37 C. C. A. 1, 94 Fed. 781 (declining to follow Massachusetts decisions); Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Bates (1896) 146 Ind. 364, 45 N. Civ. App. 142, 20 S. W. 1002; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Nass (1900; Tex. Civ. App.) 57 S. W. 910. See also Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Mackey (1895) 157 U. S. 72, 39 L. ed. 624, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 491; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Archibald (1898) 170 U. S. 665, 42 L. ed. 1188, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 777, where, although the precise point decided is merely that a railway company owes employees a duty to have foreign cars as well as its own inspected, the facts involved and the language used by the court show that the duty was regarded as one of the nondelegable class.

The Indiana case cited above overrules the suggestion to the opposite effect in Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. McMullen (1889) 117 Ind. 439, 20 N. E. 287, and explains Neuts v. Jackson Hill Coal & Coke Co. (1894) 139 Ind. 411, 38 N. E. 324, 30 N. E. 147 (see VII. b, infra) as a case in which the rule as to the liability of railway companies for the defective condition of foreign cars was not applicable, as the defective car was merely delivered to a coal company to be loaded with coal.

The duty extends, of course, to defects inherent in the original construction of the appliance, as well as to defects which may have supervened while it was in use. Thus, a railway company is absolutely bound to use ordinary and reasonable care to see that a foreign car is constructed safely,—as, for example, that it is furnished with such appurtenances as handles, ladders, or other safeguards in common use. Dooner v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1894) 104 Pa. 17, 30 Atl. 269.

In Massachusetts, while mere ownership is probably not regarded as being of itself a differentiating factor, the doctrine which will be explained at length in VII. b, infra, that a master is not liable for negligence in the inspection of instrumentalities in their ordinary use from day to day, involves the consequence that the employees deputed to examine foreign cars are merely fellow servants of the trainmen.

In Mackin v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1833) 135 Mass. 201, the court reasoned thus: "Although, perhaps, the mere ownership is not material, a car so received, while in transit to its destination, and until ready for such inspection as would be suitable and necessary in preparation for its return, would not come within the rule applicable to machinery and appliances furnished by the defendant. According to the course of business, well known to the plaintiff, and notorious, the defendant was in the habit of receiving many such cars daily, and drawing them over its road as a part of its freight trains. Even in the absence of any statute, or special contract, regulating the terms of receiving and drawing such cars, the defendant was bound, as a common carrier, to receive and draw them. Vermont & M. R. Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1867) 14 Allen, 462, 92 Am. Dec. 785. 54 L. R. A.

The obligation of drawing cars over its road would not extend to such as were in an unsafe condition; but, as to cars so received, the duty of the defendant is not that of furnishing proper instrumentalities for service, but of inspection; and this duty is performed by the employment of sufficient, competent, and suitable inspectors, who are to act under proper superintendence, rules, and instructions; and, however it may be as to other cars, the inspectors must be deemed to be engaged in a common employment with the brakemen as to such cars, while in transit, and until ready to be inspected for a new service." To the same effect, see Keith v. New Haven & N. Co. (1885) 140 Mass. 175, 3 N. E. 28; Little Miami R. Co. v. Fitzpatrick (1884) 42 Ohio St. 318; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Gaines (1885) 46 Ark. 555.

Under this theory it is conceded that the receiving company may be held responsible, where it has omitted to provide for a proper system of inspection, and for its negligence in the selection of an inspector. Keith v. New Haven & N. Co. (1885) 140 Mass. 175, 3 N. E. 28.

This represents the full extent of its liability. Thyng v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1892) 156 Mass. 13, 30 N. E. 769.

IV. Nonliability of the master for negligence of servants in respect to the details of the work.

a. Generally.

By dint of numerous decisions during the last thirty years with respect to the same or similar groups of facts the boundary line between the respective domain of the doctrine of common employment and the doctrine of nondelegable duties may now be traced with reasonable precision along a large part of its extraordinarily devious course. But its actual position is still so largely a matter of controversy in any jurisdiction in which the facts to be passed upon are not covered by a precedent so close as to be decisive, that the volume of litigation relating to this department of the law of employer's liability seems to be steadily growing. Nor, when we consider the extreme vagueness of the tests propounded for the purpose of distinguishing acts which are from acts which are not done by a servant as the master's representative, is there any ground for expecting that the further classification of principles will be other than a slow and tedious process.

The boundary line between the act of a master and the act of an employee is sometimes quite vague and shadowy. Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1894) 142 N. Y. 416, 421, 25 L. R. A. 396, 37 N. E. 466; Vitto v. Keogan (1897) 15 App. Div. 329, 44 N. Y. Supp. 1.

In Fraser v. Red River Lumber Co. (1891) 45 Minn. 235, 47 N. W. 785, the court, after referring to the rule that the question whether a servant is a vice principal must be determined by the nature of the duties which he is performing, proceeded thus: "While we have no disposition to impinge upon the just and salutary rule that makes it the primary duty of the master to furnish to his servants safe instrumentalities and places for work, yet we are satisfied that in many cases the courts, by indulging in too much refined and artificial reasoning, have carried the rule altogether too far, and have often held the master liable in cases where the untutored minds of laymen, in the exercise merely of common sense, would unhesitatingly say that the master had not been derelict in the performance of any duty towards his servants. When it is considered that, where numerous employees are all engaged in prosecuting the same general object, there is hardly one of them whose duties do not, in part at least, in some way relate to or affect the safety of the instrumentalities with which, or of the places in which, the others work, it is easy to see that the rule referred to may be, as it often has been, carried so far as to practically abrogate the whole doctrine of 'common employment.'"

The following passage from the dissenting opinion of Mitchell, J., in Tierney v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1885) 33 Minn. 811, 53 Am. Rep. 35, 23 N. W. 229, is worthy of notice as indicating some of the difficulties of precisely fixing, with reference to such a principle, with precision the division line between nondelegable duties and the duties of fellow servants: "This rule [i. e. as to nondelegable duties] has been sometimes understood as meaning that the master is responsible to his servants for the negligence of every employee, however subordinate his station, who is engaged in performing the most common executive duties in the matters of repairing, examining, or watching the instrumentalities intended for the use of other servants. I think this is a misapprehension of the rule, which has sometimes arisen from losing sight of the distinction between one who is clothed with the powers of the master in the control and supervision of some department of the business, and who is pro hac vice the representative or alter ego of the master, and one who simply performs what may be termed mere executive details. . . . The management of an extensive business, like that of operating a railroad, includes so many departments and so many grades of service that it may not always be an easy matter to draw the line between those who are to be deemed 'vice principals,' or representatives of the master, and those who are to be deemed 'fellow servants,' as to other employees; but the fact of such a distinction is everywhere recognized. To hold that the master is responsible to his servants for the negligence of every employee of the most subordinate rank who is engaged in the department of repairing, examining, watching, or guarding the instrumentalities used by other employees, would virtually abrogate the whole doctrine of 'common employment.' There is hardly an employee in the service of any railroad whose duties do not, in part at least, relate to the matter of maintaining in safe condition the track or rolling stock. If the rule be that all these pro hac vice represent the master, and are performing his duty, the same rule must be applied to all masters alike. Such a rule, if applied to farmers, manufacturers, and others, would, I think, effect a radical change in what has been supposed to be the law. And yet this is, I think, the logical result to which the opinion in this case would seem to lead; for I can see no distinction in principle between these 'car-inspectors' and switch-tenders, station agents, guards, watchmen, and the like, in so far as their duties relate to maintaining in safe condition the machinery and other instrumentalities of the master, designed to be used by his employees."

It is sufficiently evident that, for the determination of the question, what work may "ordinarily be intrusted to them [servants] without liability to their fellow servants for their negligence" (O'Connor v. Rich [1895] 164 Mass. 560, 42 N. E. 111), the essence of the problem is to discover some rational basis upon which the theory that the master is under an absolute obligation to use due care in providing and maintaining a safe environment for his servants shall be adjusted to the practical situation which results from the fact that any delinquency of a servant which actually eventuates in injury to a fellow servant must, in the very nature of the case, operate so as to render the environment of the sufferer unsafe. In a very recent case we find the New York court of appeals commenting upon the fact that "under the guise of an application of the rule requiring a master to furnish a reasonably safe place for his servants to work in, other attempts before this have been made to deprive a defendant of the benefit of another equally well-settled and just rule of the law of negligence, that a party shall not be held responsible to a servant for an injury occasioned by the neglect of a competent coemployee." Perry v. Rogers (1898) 157 N. Y. 261, 51 N. E. 1021.

It is clear that the problem is not susceptible of the simple solution, sometimes explicitly offered by counsel, and still more frequently repudiated by judges in their opinions, that a delinquency may constitute a breach of the master's duty to furnish a safe place of work merely because the place of work is thereby made unsafe for the time being.

In Hermann v. Port Blakely Mill Co. (1896) 71 Fed. 853, the court said with regard to such a contention: "The word 'place,' in my judgment, means the premises where the work is being done, and does not comprehend the negligent acts of fellow servants, by reason of which the place is rendered unsafe or dangerous. The fact that the negligent act of a fellow servant renders a place of work unsafe is no sure and safe test of the master's duty and liability in this respect, for it may well be said that any negligence which results in damage to someone makes a particular spot or place dangerous or unsafe. To so hold would virtually be making the master responsible for any negligence of a fellow servant which renders a place of work unsafe or dangerous. It would be doing the very thing which it is the policy and object of the general rule not to do. It would create a liability which the master could not avoid by the exercise of any degree of foresight or care."

In Stourbridge v. Brooklyn City R. Co. (1896) 9 App. Div. 129, 41 N. Y. Supp. 128, the court, in discussing the contention of the plaintiff that the case fell within the principle that a master is bound to furnish a reasonably safe place for his servants to work, said: "If this rule is applicable to the present case, then it would follow that for the negligence of any servants to whom the master had committed the duty of providing a safe place the master himself would be liable. I think, however, that this is not the case of a 'place' within the meaning of the rule. As stated in Butler v. Townsend (1891) 126 N. Y. 105, 26 N. E. 1017, doubtless in one sense of the term the employee must always be in some place, and doubtless also the place in a certain sense is not safe if an accident occurs there. But the rule that the master must provide a safe place for work only applies where the work and the place are not connected; where the work is not in the construction of the place."

The negligent use by one employee of perfectly safe machinery will seldom be adjudged a breach of the master's duty of providing a safe place for other employees. Such a construction would make any negligent misplacement of a switch, any negligent collision of trains, even any negligent dropping of tools about a factory, a breach of the duty of providing a safe place. Howard v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. (1886) 26 Fed. 837.

That it was the duty of appellant to use ordinary care in furnishing appellee a suitable track and other appliances upon and with which to do his work, there can be no question; but, if his fellow servants negligently encroached upon this track while he was at work, it must be regarded as their negligence, and not the negligence of the master. Were the rule different, every servant, properly engaged in operating cars upon the track, who receives injury through the negligence of another servant in improperly running thereon, would be entitled to recover against the master. In other words, in every case of the collision of two trains, those employees receiving injury who were not in fault would be entitled to recover against the master, by reason of the negligence of those who were in fault, upon the theory that the duty of the master in reference to the track applies as well to the acts of fellow servants as to strangers. We incline to think, as an original proposition, that this would have been the proper rule for our courts to have adopted, but the adverse decisions are now too numerous to undertake to overturn them. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Campbell (1894; Tex. Civ. App.) 39 S. W. 1104. Compare the language used in Jarman v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (1898) 98 Mich. 135, 57 N. W. 32; Martin v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1897) 166 U. S. 399, 41 L. ed. 1051, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 603; Richmond Locomotive & Mach. Works v. Ford (1897) 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. 509; Jenkins v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1898) 89 S. C. 507, 18 S. E. 162; and also the cases as the adjustment of railway switches cited in V. o. 5, 4/ra.

All the authorities are agreed as to the general proposition that a master who has furnished a reasonably safe place to work in, and reasonably safe appliances to work with, cannot be held liable to a servant whose coservant has, by his negligence, rendered that place or those appliances unsafe, without the master's fault or knowledge.

When it appears that the working place originally, and when the employee was sent to do work there, was reasonably safe, but became unsafe at the particular time of the accident by causes that could not have been anticipated, by exigencies created in carrying out the details of the work, or by the neglect of a fellow servant, a different rule is applicable. Baird v. Reilly (1899) 85 C. C. A. 78, 63 U. S. App. 157, 92 Fed. 884.

If a master provides a safe place for work it is the duty of a servant, by attention to details of arrangement and execution, to guard it against insecurity; and if a servant be injured by neglect of such details, no matter by whom, the negligence is that of a fellow servant. Geoghegan v. Atlas S. S. Co. (1893) 3 Misc. 224, 22 N. Y. Supp. 749.

But there are too many latent ambiguities in such a statement to admit of its being used as a serviceable differentiating test of liability or nonliability. Nor is the situation rendered any clearer by laying down the rule that, if the negligent act or omission of a servant was in the discharge of the servant's duty, the master is not liable to coservants in the same employment for such negligent act or omission. Sofield v. Guggenheim Smelting Co. (1900) 64 N. J. L. 605, 50 L. R. A. 417, 46 Atl. 711.

Equally indefinite is the doctrine that the negligence of a coservant which relieves a master from liability is the omission of such coservant to perform some act which it is his duty to perform. Gates v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1892) 2 S. D. 422, 50 N. W. 907.

In practical litigation, therefore, the courts have been accustomed to rely, rather, upon certain subsidiary conceptions which, when analyzed from various points of view, involve the general principle underlying these and similar formularies. The varieties of phraseology in which the results of this analysis find expression are quite numerous, but may all, it would seem, be grouped under one of the heads indicated in the following subdivisions.

b. Supervision of details not a master's duty.

a master's obligations are susceptible of being stated is that he is not bound to supervise the merely executive details of the work to be done by his servants.

It would be extending the liability of the master beyond any established rule, to require him to oversee and supervise the executive details of mechanical work carried on under his employment, and there is no rule of law which authorizes it. Hassey v. Coger (1889) 112 N. Y. 614, 3 L. R. A. 559, 20 N. E. 556.

The master is under no duty to make regulations as to matters of executive detail. Besel v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1877) 70 N. Y. 171 (not culpable to omit to prescribe how many men should be sent with a train of cars on their way to the repair shop).

The master does not insure his employees against each other, nor is he bound to supervise and direct every detail of their labor. They must exercise their own senses in the selection of material out of the mass provided for them; they must use their own judgments as to the manner of handling it. No employer could bear the burden of legal responsibility for every blunder or neglect on the part of each and all of his employees. The fact that one employee is more skillful than another, or has had greater experience, and is so deferred to by others, does not change his relation to his employer or to his fellows. Nor does a difference in rank or grade of service change the rule. When the character of the business requires it, the master is as much bound to provide his workmen with a reasonably competent foreman as to provide them with tools, but in either case his liability ceases when he has made a suitable selection. What remains to be done is that each workman, whatever his rank or skill or experience, shall, with reasonable diligence and intelligence, discharge his duty towards his employer and his fellows. We are not disposed to discuss the question, on which some courts have differed, how far down in the chain of delegated appointments the master is to be held as bound to personal supervision. The starting point, that he is only liable for his own neglect, is one from which we have no right to depart. And it is plain enough that, when he is held to any personal supervision which from the nature of his business is impracticable, the rule is violated, and there is no tangible distinction left between liability to strangers. We think some of the decisions have led very far towards destroying all means of discernment. Michigan C. R. Co. v. Dolan (1875) 32 Mich. 510.

It would be absurd to say that the owners owed a duty to the seamen, that too long a hawser should never be used, or that signals in a fog should be properly given by their own vessel. The Queen (1889) 40 Fed. 694.

A railway company is under "no positive duty to supervise the details of the operation of switching cars" in its yard. Central R. Co. v. Keegan (1895) 160 U. S. 259, 40 L. ed. 413, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269.

A railway company cannot be held liable for the negligence of the foreman of a gang of track repairers in failing to set a lookout, as prescribed by a rule of the company, upon the theory that someone else should have looked after him and seen that he did his duty. Duthie v. Caledonian R. Co. (1898) 25 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 934.

In Ryan v. Cumberland Valley R. Co. (1854) 23 Pa. 384, in discussing an allegation of the plaintiff, (a laborer on a construction train who was injured by the carelessness of the engineer), that the neglect of the engineer in failing to see that all the cars were safely coupled before starting his train was chargeable to the company, observed: "This alleged duty did not grow out of any contract between the plaintiff and the defendants, else the contract would have been charged as an essential and relevant bond of their relation, which has not been done. If it was a duty which the engineer owed to the plaintiff in any way, then the action ought to be against him for the breach of it. If he owed it to the defendants, then they alone can complain of its nonperformance. The duty must therefore be alleged as that of the defendants to the plaintiff. In what form shall we put it, or how shall we define it? Is it that, when persons are employed to work for others, the employers are bound to see that the instruments of their work are and shall continue in a condition to be used with safety? Then the coachman, the wagoner, and the carter, who ought to know more about the vehicles which they use than their employers do, have a practical warranty that they are in good order, though practically we know that many of them are nearly worn out; the wood-chopper and the grubber are insured that their axe or mattock shall not injure them by flying off the handle; the engineer, the miller, the cotton-spinner, and the wool-carder have a guarantee for the accidents that may befall them in the use of the machinery which they profess to understand, and which they ought so to understand as to be able to inform their employers when it is out of order. If this be so, then the care and skill required of workmen is reduced very much below what is ordinarily expected of them. If there be any distinction between any of the cases put and the one in hand, it is too narrow to be made the foundation of a new rule, or to cancel the force of the analogy which they afford. Certainly such a duty has never been considered as belonging to these relations, and therefore it cannot be law."

Other illustrations of the same phraseology may be found in Denenfeld v. Baumann (1898) 40 App. Div. 502, 58 N. Y. Supp. 110; Hart v. New York Floating Dry Dock Co. (1883) 16 Jones & S. 460; Fraser v. Stott (1899) 120 Mich. 624, 79 N. W. 896.

A detail of the work in this sense has been defined as anything so "connected with work being done as to be an essential part of its performance," and "necessary to insure its safe completion." Golden v. Sieghardt (1898) 38 App. Div. 161, 53 N. Y. Supp. 460.

But this definition is not of much assistance, except in so far as it is explained by the mere categorical affirmations of principle in the following subdivisions.

It may be remarked that, by predicating the nonexistence of a duty on the part of an employee alleged to be a vice principal to supervise his subordinates in the performance of their work, the necessity of inquiring into the correctness of that allegation is sometimes dispensed with. A conductor, for instance, is bound to give orders as to the movement of the several parts of a freight train at a station, but he is not in duty required to follow up each brakeman, and see how each movement is executed. Belyea v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. (1892) 112 Mo. 86, 18 L. R. A. 817, 20 S. W. 480, where it was held not to be negligence for the conductor to leave to the brakeman the work of seeing that the brakes were properly set on each of the cars which were left standing on a grade.

In nearly all the cases in which this rule as to details of work constitutes a protection to the master, the evidence shows actual negligence on the part of the fellow servants of the plaintiff. But it is a mistake to lay down, without qualification, that "the negligence in such a case is said to resolve itself into the negligence of a fellow servant." Jones v. St. Louis, N. & P. Packet Co. (1891) 43 Mo. App. 398, Citing 54 L. R. A.

Bowen v. Chicago, B. & K. C. R. Co. (1888) 95 Mo. 268, 277, 8 S. W. 230. Compare also the following passage from the opinion in Kimmer v. Weber (1897) 151 N. Y. 417, 45 N. E. 860: Assuming that his attention was so called to the matter, as testified to by this witness, was the foreman guilty of negligence attributable to the master, in permitting the workmen to go on with the work upon the platform that they had erected to suit themselves? If his judgment was wrong with respect to the sufficiency of the platform, so was that of the workmen. They knew as much with respect to the safety of the place where they stood as he did. None of the masons suggested to anyone that the scaffold was unsafe. Whatever was said on that subject was by one of the plumbers when he saw the men using their scaffold. If, under these circumstances, the foreman had refused or declined to interfere with what had been done by the workmen, and he trusted to their judgment, it was not such negligence as to charge the defendants with the result of the accident. It was, at most, but an error of judgment on the part of the foreman with respect to a detail of the work in which the masons were engaged. He concluded, as the workmen themselves did, that the place was safe, and in determining that question they were all co-servants."

Sometimes the circumstances seem to be such that the master's immunity may be referred indifferently to any one of three conceptions, viz., that the servant was himself a participant in the acts of negligence, that his fellow servants were negligent, or that the negligent act was an incidental detail of the work as to which no duty on the master's part can be predicated.

In Hogan v. Field (1887) 44 Hun, 72, the action was held to be barred on the first of these grounds, but upon the evidence the other two would apparently have been available as valid defenses.

c. Merely transitory perils; master not bound to protect the servant against.

See V. 2, infra.

A form of expression which is often met with in recent cases, particularly in Massachusetts, is that there can be no recovery where "the danger to which the plaintiff was exposed was merely a transitory one existing only on the single occasion when the injury was sustained, and due to no fault of plan or construction, or lack of repair, and to no permanent defect or want of safety in the defendant's works, or in the manner in which they had been ordinarily used." Meehan v. Speirs Mfg. Co. (1899) 172 Mass. 875, 52 N. E. 518.

Or, as the rule has also been enunciated, "the absolute obligation of an employer to see that due care is used to provide safe appliances for his workmen is not extended to all the passing risks which arise from short-lived causes." Whittaker v. Bent (1897) 167 Mass. 588, 46 N. E. 121, per Holmes, J.

A "temporary contrivance" was opposed to a "permanent attachment," in Kiffin v. Wendt (1899) 39 App. Div. 229, 57 N. Y. Supp. 109.

d. Dangers caused by the progress of the work; master not bound to protect servant against.

One special application of the general conception underlying the rule stated in the preceding subdivision is that, where the work is of such a character that, as it progresses, the environment of the servant must necessarily undergo frequent changes, the master is not bound to protect the servants engaged in it against the dangers resulting from those changes.

Where the place, as it stands when the work begins is perfectly safe, and the danger can only arise as the work progresses, and be caused by the work done, it is not the duty of the employer to stand by during the progress of the work, to see when a danger arises. It is sufficient if he provides against such dangers as may possibly or probably arise and to give the workmen the means of protecting themselves. Durst v. Carnegie Steel Co. (1896) 173 Pa. 102, 33 Atl. 1102.

The duty of a master to provide his servants a safe place in which to work does not attach where the place becomes dangerous in the progress of the work, either necessarily or from the manner in which the work is done. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Brown (1896) 20 C. C. A. 147, 34 U. S. App. 759, 73 Fed. 970.

The employer's obligation towards his employee does not oblige him to keep the working place in a safe condition at every moment of the work, so far as its safety depends upon the due performance of the work by fellow servants of the employee. Baird v. Reilly (1899) 35 C. C. A. 78, 63 U. S. App. 157, 92 Fed. 884.

It makes a vast difference in the question of the liability of the master, whether, when a servant meets with an accident from a defect in the previous work, occurring through the negligence of a servant engaged in its construction, the negligence is to be deemed as arising from a failure to provide a safe place, or as negligence in the general enterprise in the prosecution of which all the workmen are engaged. If the first, the master is liable, even though the negligence is that of a servant, because the duty is that of the master; if the second, it is the negligence of a co-servant, and the master is not liable for it. Stourbridge v. Brooklyn City R. Co. (1896) 9 App. Div. 129, 41 N. Y. Supp. 128.

The rule that a master is bound to furnish his servant a safe place in which to do his work does not apply "where the prosecution of the work itself makes the place and creates its dangers." O'Connell v. Clark (1897) 22 App. Div. 466, 48 N. Y. Supp. 74.

The rule that the duty of furnishing and maintaining a safe place and safe appliances is nondelegable "cannot apply to a condition of danger brought about by the negligent acts of a servant or a fellow servant, for whose acts he is responsible, nor to the hazards and dangers arising from the employment, and belonging to the peculiar occupation in which the servant is engaged, and which he assumed when he entered the master's service." Anderson v. Daly Min. Co. (1897) 16 Utah, 28, 50 Pac. 815.

In Petaja v. Aurora Iron Min. Co. (1896) 106 Mich. 403, 32 L. R. A. 435, 64 N. W. 335, 66 N. W. 951, the court commented upon the failure of counsel to cite any cases supporting the theory of the plaintiff "that a master is obliged to make safe the place which the servant makes and occupies as a means of doing his work, or which results as an incident of the work, although it necessitates his presence in a place, to a greater or less degree unsafe," and asked: "In such cases, must the master stay with, or follow up, the servants, to be certain that they make the place safe, so that they or some of them be not injured?" Permanent conditions and temporary changes are also contrasted in New Pittsburgh Coal & Coke Co. v. Peterson (1894) 136 Ind. 398, 35 N. E. 7.

One in-licium of a "detail" is that the appliance was not permanent, but temporary and movable, to be altered as the work progressed, by the workmen themselves, as their needs required. Maher v. McGrath (1895) 58 N. J. L. 469, 33 Atl. 945.

In another case the same court alludes to conditions in the place of work created by the workmen themselves, as the work progresses, 54 L. R. A.

and to conditions continually changing in the course of the work. Foley v. Brooklyn Gaslight Co. (1896) 9 App. Div. 91, 41 N. Y. Supp. 66. The cases in which this principle is most usually applied are those involving the various kinds of construction work.

The obligation of a master to provide reasonably safe places and structures for his servants to work upon does not impose upon him the duty, as towards them, of keeping a building which they are employed in erecting, in a safe condition at every moment of their work so far as its safety depends upon the due performance of that work by them and their fellow servants. Armour v. Hahn (1884) 111 U. S. 313, 28 L. ed. 440, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 433.

The duty of a master to furnish a safe place for the performance of work does not require him to keep that place safe under the constantly changing conditions which the performance of such a work as the construction of a sewer necessitates. Minneapolis v. Lundin (1893) 7 C. C. A. 344, 19 U. S. App. 245, 58 Fed. 525. See also Durst v. Carnegie Steel Co. (1896) 173 Pa. 102, 33 Atl. 1102; Donnelly v. Booth Bros. & H. I. Granite Co. (1897) 90 Me. 111, 37 Atl. 874, and the cases cited in VI. b, 3, infra.

It should be observed that in some cases of this class the element of a fellow servant's negligence is not involved at all, and recovery is denied on the broad ground that there is no breach of duty on the master's part.

Thus, it has been held that the danger to workmen walking on the keelson of a barge which they were engaged in unloading, owing to the rounding top thereof, is not one for which the master is responsible, as it is a condition which the workmen create as the work progresses and the keelson is exposed. Foley v. Brooklyn Gaslight Co. (1896) 9 App. Div. 91, 41 N. Y. Supp. 66.

So, a master is not liable as for a failure to furnish a safe place of work, where he ordered the injured servant to push a draft of bales which, while it was being hoisted, had caught in the coamings of a hatch, and one of the bales fell on the servant. O'Connell v. Clark (1896) 6 App. Div. 33, 39 N. Y. Supp. 454 (1897) 22 App. Div. 466, 48 N. Y. Supp. 74.

e. Preparation or care of instrumentalities; master not responsible for, where these functions are a part of the work to be done.

The cases determined by the conception adverted to in the preceding subdivision often involve facts which may also be discussed with relation to the principle that the master is not liable, as for negligence in failing to provide or maintain safe instrumentalities, in any case where the preparation or care of these instrumentalities constitutes a part of the work which the injured servant or his coemployees undertook to do.

In Robinson v. George F. Blake Mfg. Co. (1887) 148 Mass. 528, 10 N. E. 814, the court thus criticised an instruction: "It is not a universal rule of law that an implied duty rests upon an employer to furnish suitable means, machines, implements, and instrumentalities for doing his work. This may depend on the nature of the employment and the circumstances of the case. The natural inference from these might be that the servant or person employed was to furnish his own tools and appliances. Or the nature of the work to be done might be such that it would be natural and reasonable to infer that both parties understood that the servant should procure whatever might prove to be needed, according to his own judgment, as a part of his employment. If a person is employed to do a piece of work himself, with the understanding that he shall procure such means, materials, or implements as he finds to be needed and if he enters upon the execution of the work and procures insufficient or defective means, materials, or implements, it might be found that the master did not assume any responsibility to such servant for their sufficiency or quality, even though he was to pay for them. Nor is the case necessarily different, if the person so employed is authorized to engage others to help him do the work, as well as to procure means and appliances. If, for example, the work to be done should include the moving or raising of a heavy article, which could be done with the use of a simple fulcrum and lever, and the employer's foreman, in charge of the work, should be left to provide them at the place where the work was to be done, and he should take a common stone for the fulcrum and a piece of scantling or a rail from a neighboring fence for the lever, and the stone should roll, or the lever break, and one of the men engaged in the work should be hurt thereby, a jury would naturally find that such selection of materials and appliances was a part of the work to be done, and not within the implied duty and undertaking of the employer."

The rule that the master must provide a safe place for work only applies where the work and the place are not connected, where the work is not in the construction of the place. Stourbridge v. Brooklyn City R. Co. (1896) 9 App. Div. 129, 41 N. Y. Supp. 128.

A distinction has, however, been made, so that where it appears that as a part of or an incident to the work which the employee is to do, such employee is required to erect a scaffold or other appliance necessary to do the work, neglect in the erection of such scaffold is not a neglect to perform a duty that the employer owes to his employee. Richards v. Hayes (1897) 17 App. Div. 422, 45 N. Y. Supp. 234.

The rule that a master must furnish suitable tools and appliances and a safe place to work is qualified by another that, where the master furnishes suitable appliances, and the duty to adjust them properly to work of a temporary character is neglected by a fellow workman whose business it is to attend to that detail, the master is not liable to a fellow workman injured by that neglect. Divver v. Hall (1897) 21 Misc. 452, 47 N. Y. Supp. 630.

We shall not attempt to do what no court has yet been able to do, viz., formulate a statement of the rule that will furnish a test by which to determine every case; but we may suggest that, in our opinion, an important consideration, often overlooked, is whether the structure, appliance, or instrumentality is one which has been furnished for the work in which the servants are to be engaged, or whether the furnishing and preparation of it are themselves part of the work which they are employed to perform. If it be the latter, then, as is well settled by our decisions, the master is not liable. Fraser v. Red River Lumber Co. (1891) 45 Minn. 235, 47 N. W. 785.

The rule as to common employment does not apply to a case "where several persons are employed to do certain work, and by the contract of employment, either express or implied, the employees are to adjust the appliances by which the work is to be done." Burns v. Sennett (1893) 99 Cal. 363, 33 Pac. 916.

Bull (1896) 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017; and the cases cited in subtitle VI. infra.

Both these aspects of the master's nonliability are sometimes associated closely together, as where a court speaks of a place in which conditions are constantly changing and of which the furnishing and preparation was in itself part of the work the employees were required to perform. Consolidated Coal & Min. Co. v. Clay (1894) 51 Ohio St. 542, sub nom. Consolidated Coal & Min. Co. v. Floyd, 25 L. R. A. 848, 38 N. E. 610.

The consideration of this principle from a slightly different standpoint yields the rule that it is always a condition precedent to the exemption of the master from liability that the operations which were the immediate cause of the injury were a part of the regular duties of the servants themselves. McGinty v. Athol Reservoir Co. (1892) 155 Mass. 183, 29 N. E. 510.

1. Negligent use of safe appliances by fellow servant; master not responsible for.

Another ground of distinction relied upon by the courts is based upon the theory that the master, while responsible for intrinsic defects in the instrumentalities which would not have existed if the servants intrusted with the functions of supplying or maintaining them had exercised proper care, cannot be held liable for injuries caused by the manner in which the servants use those instrumentalities for the performance of their work.

The duty of the master "does not extend so far as to require of him that he should be responsible for the negligence of his servants, if of competent skill and experience, in using or managing the means and appliances placed in their hands in the course of their employment, if they are neither defective nor insufficient." Snow v. Housatonic R. Co. (1864) 8 Allen, 441, 85 Am. Dec. 720.

For the management of his machinery and the conduct of his servants a master is not responsible to their fellow servants. Gilman v. Eastern R. Co. (1866) 13 Allen, 433, 90 Am. Dec. 210.

The master has done his whole duty when he supplies the proper appliances, the care and use of which must be necessarily intrusted to his servants. Jones v. Granite Mills (1878) 126 Mass. 84, 30 Am. Rep. 661.

A master is not liable for acts incidental to the management and use of the appliances furnished. McKinnon v. Norcross (1889) 148 Mass. 533, 3 L. R. A. 320, 20 N. E. 183.

One line of distinction between vice principals and coemployees is in the duty, in one instance, to supply or maintain instrumentalities of the service, and, in the other, of using the instrumentalities supplied. Neuts v. Jackson Hill Coal & Coke Co. (1894) 139 Ind. 411, 38 N. E. 324, 39 N. E. 147.

A master is not liable for the "negligence of those engaged with the plaintiff in making use of a place admittedly safe." Baron v. Detroit & C. Steam Nav. Co. (1892) 91 Mich. 585, 52 N. W. 22.

It is no part of the duty of the master to direct workmen in the use of the tools with which they perform their work. Hussey v. Coger (1899) 112 N. Y. 614, 3 L. R. A. 569, 20 N. E. 556.

The line of demarkation here between the absolute duty of the master and duty of the servants is the line that separates the work of construction, preparation, and preservation from the work of operation. Is the act in question work required to construct, to prepare, to place in a safe location, or to keep in repair, the machinery furnished by the employer? If so, it is his personal duty to exercise ordinary care to perform it. Is the act in question required to properly and safely operate the machinery furnished, or to prevent the safe place in which it was furnished from becoming dangerous through its negligent operation? If so, it is the duty of the servants to perform that act, and they, and not the master, assume the risk of negligence in its performance. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Needham (1894) 25 L. R. A. 833, 11 C. C. A. 56, 27 U. S. App. 227, 63 Fed. 107.

After rejecting the theory that the negligent use of materials can be, in the majority of cases, a breach of the master's duty, the court said: "The true idea is that the place and the instruments must in themselves be safe, for this is what the master's duty fairly compels, and not that the master must see that no negligent handling by an employee of the machinery shall create danger." Howard v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. (1886) 26 Fed. 887.

In Hard v. Vermont & C. R. Co. (1860) 32 Vt. 473, the court adverts to the difference between the master's obligation as to equipping and as to operating a railway.

See also Smith v. Empire Transp. Co. (1895) 89 Hun. 568, 35 N. Y. Supp. 534.

That is to say, the master performs his whole duty if he supplies an instrumentality which is safe if carefully used by the fellow servants of the complainant (Fowler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. [1884] 61 Wis. 159, 21 N. W. 40; Hogan v. Smith [1891] 125 N. Y. 774, 26 N. E. 742); or, in other words, where an appliance is reasonably safe to operate, and its operation necessarily rests upon the care, intelligence, and fidelity of the fellow servants of the person injured, the master will not be held responsible for an accident, the nature of which indicates that it must have been due to the manner in which the appliance was operated by one of those workmen. Dana v. Crown Point Iron Co. (1893) 51 N. Y. S. R. 238, 22 N. Y. Supp. 455.

The cases decided on this theory sometimes involve facts which show the master to be free from culpability for the reason that the instrumentality in question was applied to the purpose of the work without his authority. See III. c. supra.

Negligence as regards the use of instrumentalities may, it is clear, be committed in one of the following ways. It is often difficult to say precisely under which of the categories the delinquency in question should be classed, but in practical litigation this is not a matter of any importance, since the result is the same whatever may be the strictly logical designation of the negligent act.

The delinquent coservant may have so handled or placed a safe instrumentality so carelessly as to convert it for the time being into an injurious agency. See the cases cited above, and also the following: Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Brown (1896) 20 C. C. A. 147, 34 U. S. App. 759, 73 Fed. 970; Pelrice v. Kille (1897) 26 C. C. A. 201, 58 U. S. App. 291, 80 Fed. 865; The Queen (1889) 40 Fed. 694; McDermott v. Boston (1882) 133 Mass. 349; Trcka v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. (1896) 100 Iowa, 205, 69 N. W. 422; Worheide v. Missouri Car & Foundry Co. (1888) 32 Mo. App. 367; McLaughlin v. Camdea Iron Works (1897) 60 N. J. L. 557, 38 Atl. 677.

Any machine may be made dangerous if wrongfully or negligently used. Callaway v. Allen (1894) 12 C. C. A. 114, 24 U. S. App. 388, 64 Fed. 297.

The delinquent may have created the abnormal danger by his negligence in selecting the defective instrumentality from the stock of materials supplied. See especially the cases cited in V. h. infra, and the following: Callan v. Bull (1896) 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017; Daley 64 L. R. A.

v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1888) 147 Mass. 101, 16 N. E. 690; Young v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1897) 105 Mass. 210, 46 N. E. 624; Kennedy v. Spring (1893) 160 Mass. 203, 35 N. E. 779; McKinnon v. Norcross (1889) 148 Mass. 533, 3 L. R. A. 320, 20 N. E. 183; Fraser v. Red River Lumber Co. (1891) 43 Minn. 235, 47 N. W. 785; McCone v. Gallagher (1897) 16 App. Div. 272, 44 N. Y. Supp. 697; Moore v. McNell (1898) 35 App. Div. 323, 54 N. Y. Supp. 956; Guggenheim Smelting Co. v. Flanigan (1898) 62 N. J. L. 354, 41 Atl. 844, 42 Atl. 145; Willis v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. (1884) 11 Or. 257, 4 Pac. 121; Ross v. Walker (1891) 139 Pa. 42, 21 Atl. 157, 159.

In Simpson v. Central Vermont R. Co. (1896) 5 App. Div. 614, 39 N. Y. Supp. 464, the court said: "To provide these supplies (i. e., new wicks) for use was the master's duty: to take them as they were needed for use was the servant's duty."

The delinquent coservant may have failed to use the instrumentalities furnished, and so have created the abnormal danger which caused the injury. See, for example, Griffiths v. Gildow (1858) 3 Illust. & N. 648, 27 L. J. Exch. N. S. 404; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Brown (1896) 20 C. C. A. 147, 34 U. S. App. 759, 73 Fed. 970; Kaare v. Troy Steel & Iron Co. (1893) 139 N. Y. 869, 34 N. E. 901; Hudson v. Ocean S. S. Co. (1888) 110 N. Y. 625, 17 N. E. 342; Dwyer v. Hall (1897) 21 Misc. 452, 47 N. Y. Supp. 630, Reversing 20 Misc. 677, 46 N. Y. Supp. 533; McAndrews v. Burns (1876) 39 N. J. L. 117 (omission to deliver here); Laporte v. Cook (1899) 21 R. I. 158, 42 Atl. 519; and the cases cited in V. i-k, infra.

The duty of a foreman in using the means and appliances provided for safely and properly carrying on the work is that of a servant engaged in the same business with the plaintiff, even if he acted as the representative of the master in furnishing such means and appliances. Floyd v. Sugden (1883) 184 Mass. 563.

The delinquent may have been in control of the injured servant and caused the injury by giving his fellow servants some direction as to the use of the appliances, or by sending the injured servant to work in a specially dangerous place without due warning, or a positive assurance that he would not be put in peril by complying with the order. See Hodgkins v. Eastern R. Co. (1876) 119 Mass. 419; Martin v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1895) 65 Fed. 384; McBride v. Indianapolis Frog & Switch Co. (1892) 5 Ind. App. 482, 32 N. E. 579; Tully v. New York & T. S. S. Co. (1896) 10 App. Div. 463, 42 N. Y. Supp. 29; Craig v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1893) 54 Mo. App. 523; and the cases cited in V. a-e, infra.

g. Rationale of doctrine exempting master from liability for negligence in carrying out the details of the work.

Viewed from the standpoint of the extent of a master's obligations to his servant, the doctrine that there can be no recovery for the negligence of a coservant in respect to the details of the work has been regarded as one deduced ex necessitate rei. Some of the details must necessarily rest upon the intelligence and care of the servants. Sullivan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1892) 62 Conn. 209, 25 Atl. 711.

In Hodges v. Standard Wheel Co. (1899) 152 Ind. 680, 686, 52 N. E. 391, 54 N. E. 383, the court said: "That appellee did not owe to appellant, as its employee, under the circumstances, the legal duty to support the rims in question by the hands of some one of its agents or representatives in the manner as Huey was doing just previous to the accident, is certainly evident. If it could be said to be charged with that duty, then every corporation engaged in the same line of business as it was would, in legal contemplation, be required to be present at all times and places at its factory when lumber, timber, or iron, or other heavy material of like character, was being handled or moved by some of its employees, and by the hands of such agent or representatives prevent such iron, timber, or lumber, or other material connected therewith, from slipping and falling upon said employees, and thereby injuring them."

When proper tools and appliances are provided upon the premises for the use of employees, no authority can be found for imposing upon the employer the further duty of seeing that the servant does not select from among a number of appliances the one not adapted to the work in which for the time he may be occupied. If such a responsibility is cast upon the master, it would be necessary in his protection to have an alter ego to attend constantly upon every workman in his service to see that he did not use an implement unfitted for his work. Guggenheim Smelting Co. v. Flanigan (1898) 62 N. J. L. 354, 41 Atl. 844, 42 Atl. 145.

In a Delaware case the court speaks of a "duty ministerial in its character and of executive detail in the operation on the road which must of necessity be vested in [and trusted to] the faithfulness of the employee." Wheatley v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. (1894) 1 Marv. (Del.) 305, 30 Atl. 600. See also, to the same effect, Kudik v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. (1894) 78 Hun, 492, 20 N. Y. Supp. 533.

It seems difficult, however, to concede that such a consideration has any real weight except in so far as it may be a step towards the conclusion that the servant assumes the consequent risks. Taken by itself, it may be said to be equally potent as a reason for insisting that the master should be chargeable with the negligence which, under the arrangements which he has chosen to make for carrying on his business, he knows to be occasionally inevitable. Qui sentit commodum idem sentire debet et onus. In whatever cloak of verbiage it may be wrapt up, a doctrine having no more solid foundation than the hypothesis that one of these inferences, rather than the other, should be drawn from the existence of the conditions adverted to is merely one formulated ex cathedra. A much more satisfactory reason for absolving the master from liability for negligence of this description is, he is chargeable with an assumption of such risks because he knows them to be incident to the performance of the duties voluntarily undertaken by him. This is equivalent to saying that in cases in which the servant's right to recover is denied on account of the nature of the injurious act, this conclusion is, in the last analysis, referable to precisely the same elementary conception as that which underlies the doctrine of common employment itself.

The master is not responsible for the negligent performance of some detail of the work intrusted to the servant, whatever may have been the grade of the servant who executes such detail. If it is the work of the servant, and he volunteers to perform it, and the master is not in fault in furnishing proper materials, there is no breach of duty on the part of the latter. The scaffolding having been constructed by the workmen themselves, or under direction, if appliances which they made use of for that purpose were in any respect defective or insufficient they had, so far as appears, the same means of knowing that fact as the defendants. Kimmer v. Weber (1897) 151 N. Y. 417, 45 N. E. 860.

In another case the same court speaks of "a detail of the working or management of the business, the risks attending which have been assumed by the party taking employment."

Cullen v. Norton (1891) 126 N. Y. 1, 26 N. E. 905.

In Hatton v. Hilton Bridge Constr. Co. (1899) 42 App. Div. 403, 59 N. Y. Supp. 272, the court, after citing several cases as to details of work, said: "Those authorities refer to accidents occurring during the progress of the work, where the servant is necessarily aware of the danger; where he knows, or ought to know, as much in regard to the safety of the place where he is called to work as the master; to cases where the master has performed his duty of furnishing and maintaining a safe place for the servant to perform his work in, and safe and proper instrumentalities therefor. After that duty has been performed, they determine that if a servant is injured because of the manner of the performance of the work the master is not liable."

In Hogan v. Field (1887) 44 Hun, 72, the plaintiff was held not entitled to recover for the reason that while the construction of the defective scaffold was no part of the business of the gang of workmen to which he belonged, they, without objection, undertook the erection of it, and had the control and management of the work.

In McCone v. Gallagher (1897) 16 App. Div. 272, 44 N. Y. Supp. 697, the fact was emphasized that the servant's knowledge of the details and requirements of the temporary appliance which they were left to construct as a part of the work was as complete as that of the master.

In Maher v. McGrath (1896) 58 N. J. L. 469, 33 Atl. 945, the error in the construction of a scaffold was said to be one "committed by workmen with whom he [the plaintiff] was working in a common employment, subject to a common danger which all equally knew must result from a negligent construction."

In Brothers v. Cartter (1873) 52 Mo. 372, 375, 14 Am. Rep. 724, the court said: "If a workman or servant is to work in conjunction with others, he must know that the carelessness of one of his fellow servants may be productive of injury to himself, and he must know that neither care nor diligence by the master can prevent the want of due care and caution on the part of his fellow servants. The servant on entering upon the employment is supposed to know and assume this risk." This statement was adopted in Brown v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. (1880) 27 Minn. 162, 38 Am. Rep. 285, 6 N. W. 484.

As between themselves, no one more than another, in the ordinary work of navigation, represents the owner, or performs an owner's duty, and therefore each takes the risk of the other's negligence. The Queen (1889) 40 Fed. 694. See also Armour v. Hahn (1884) 111 U. S. 313, 26 L. ed. 440, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 433, the effect of which is stated in VI. b, 4, infra; Minneapolis v. Lundin (1893) 7 C. C. A. 344, 19 U. S. App. 245, 58 Fed. 525; Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. v. Frost (1896) 21 C. C. A. 186, 44 U. S. App. 606, 74 Fed. 965; Soutar v. Minneapolis International Electric Co. (1897) 68 Minn. 18, 70 N. W. 796; Slater v. Jewett (1881) 85 N. Y. 61, 29 Am. Rep. 627; Tully v. New York & T. S. S. Co. (1896) 10 App. Div. 463, 42 N. Y. Supp. 29; Donnelly v. Brown (1887) 43 Hun, 470.

In this point of view it will obviously be material, in doubtful cases, to inquire whether the operation which was the cause of the injury was ordinarily intrusted to the employees themselves. This is the conception present to the mind of the court in a recent New York case when it used the phrase, "one of the details of the business that is generally left to the workmen themselves." Kimmer v. Weber (1897) 151 N. Y. 417, 45 N. E. 860.

So, a Federal court speaks of acts which "may be all performed, and for the most part usually are directed and performed, by others than the master. The Queen (1880) 40 Fed. 604.

b. Pleading.

1. Declaration.

A declaration alleging facts which show that, if there was any negligence, it consisted in the omission of some duty characteristic of a mere servant, acting as such, is demurrable. Dwyer v. American Exp. Co. (1892) 82 Wis. 807, 52 N. W. 304; Baxter v. Abernethy (1893) 21 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 159; Carolan v. Southern P. Co. (1897) 84 Fed. 84; Davis v. Muscogee Mfg. Co. (1898) 106 Ga. 126, 32 S. E. 30; Kerr v. Crown Cotton Mills (1898) 105 Ga. 510, 31 S. E. 166; Kudik v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. (1894) 78 Hun, 492, 29 N. Y. Supp. 533; Frawley v. Sheldon (1897) 20 R. I. 258, 38 Atl. 370.

The operation of this rule cannot be prevented by the device of an averment ascribing the injury to the negligence of the master himself. Sherman v. Rochester & S. R. Co. (1853) 15 Barb. 574.

But in an action to recover damages for negligently causing the death of a servant, when the complaint positively alleges that the acts and omissions complained of were by the defendant, it cannot be presumed that they were those of a fellow employee of the deceased. Brown v. Central P. R. Co. (1885) 68 Cal. 171, 8 Pac. 828.

2. Plea.

Where a complaint is demurrable because it shows that the plaintiff was injured by the negligence of a fellow servant, such fact need not be pleaded in the answer. Mann v. O'Sullivan (1899) 126 Cal. 61, 58 Pac. 375.

Upon a plea traversing negligence by the defendant, the defense that the injury complained of was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant is open. McCarthy v. Bristol Shipowners' Co. (1888) Ir. L. R. 10 C. L. 384; s. f., Byrne v. Fennell (1882) Ir. L. R. 10 C. L. 397.

1. Instructions.

See also VI. e, infra.

Where, upon the evidence, the injury may possibly have been due to an act of the kind for which the master is not responsible, it is error to refuse instructions embodying the rule appropriate to such a case. Reichel v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1892) 130 N. Y. 682, 29 N. E. 763.

It is also ground for reversal if such instructions are omitted, where the state of the evidence is such that the jury may have been misled by such omissions.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Needham (1894) 23 L. R. A. 838, 11 C. C. A. 56, 27 U. S. App. 227, 63 Fed. 107, it was argued that, if the court erred in its charge, that error did not prejudice the company because there was uncontradicted testimony that there was no target on the switch which was left open, and the jury were charged that if the switch was not in proper order because it had no target upon it, and for that reason the injury and death were caused, the company was liable. But the court said: "This position cannot be successfully maintained. The testimony was such that the jury might well have found that the injury was neither caused nor contributed to by the absence of the target, and that it resulted solely from the negligence of the conductor who left the switch open. The defendants in error charged two acts of negligence upon this company,—the failure to provide the target; and the failure of the conductor to close the switch. Issues were raised and submitted to the jury to determine whether either of these acts caused or contributed to the injury. The verdict was general, and its generality prevents us from discovering upon which of these acts of negligence charged it was founded. A general verdict cannot be upheld where there are several issues tried, and upon any one of them error is committed, in the admission or rejection of evidence, or in the charge of the court, because it may be that the jury founded their verdict upon the very issue to which the erroneous ruling related, and that they were controlled in their finding by that ruling. What Cheer Coal Co. v. Johnson (1893) 6 C. C. A. 148, 12 U. S. App. 490, 56 Fed. 810; Maryland use of Markley v. Baldwin (1884) 112 U. S. 490, 28 L. ed. 822, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 278.

j. Functions of court and jury in passing upon evidence.

It is primarily for the jury to say whether the injury resulted from negligence in furnishing the materials, or in using them. Thomas v. Ann Arbor R. Co. (1897) 114 Mich. 59, 72 N. W. 40; Brady v. Norcross (1899) 174 Mass. 442, 54 N. E. 874; Donnelly v. Booth Bros. & H. I. Granite Co. (1897) 90 Me. 110, 37 Atl. 874; Arkerson v. Dennison (1875) 117 Mass. 407; Manning v. Hogan (1879) 78 N. Y. 615; Fitzsimmons v. Taunton (1893) 160 Mass. 223, 35 N. E. 549; Taylor v. Star Coal Co. (1899) 110 Iowa, 40, 81 N. W. 249.

The question whether a cross piece in a ladder broke under the weight of plaintiff servant because a nail that fastened its left end to the side piece was near such a knot in the side piece as was shown to have existed, is for the jury. Flanigan v. Guggenheim Smelting Co. (1899) 63 N. J. L. 647, 44 Atl. 762.

Where, at the close of the plaintiff's case, it is apparent that the evidence thus far introduced is consistent with the theory that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, it is error to rule that the doctrine of common employment is not applicable, and so exclude the defendant from offering any evidence to sustain a defense based on that doctrine. Cooper v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. (1867) 14 Allen, 193.

It is error to leave it entirely to the jury to determine what acts and duties the defendant was required to perform and discharge as principal. The proper course is to lay it down, as a matter of law, that the duty of the defendant "is to supply the servant with suitable and safe machinery and appliances, with competent and skilful coworkers, and to make and promulgate sufficient rules and regulations for the conduct of the business in its ordinary run and for any extraordinary occasions that may be reasonably anticipated" (Slater v. Jewett [1881] 85 N. Y. 61, 73, 29 Am. Rep. 627); and then ask the jury to find whether the defendant had failed in the performance of its duty in any of these respects. Hart v. New York Floating Dry Dock Co. (1882) 16 Jones & S. 480. See also VI. e, infra.

But where the evidence offered by the plaintiff is such as to be susceptible of no other construction than that the injury was caused solely by an act belonging to the category of those deemed to be characteristic of mere servants, the case should be taken from the jury.

The complaint may be dismissed. Dana v. Crown Point Iron Co. (1893) 51 N. Y. S. R. 238, 22 N. Y. Supp. 455; Denenfeld v. Baumann (1899) 40 App. Div. 502, 58 N. Y. Supp. 110; Byrne v. Eastmans Co. (1898) 27 App. Div. 270, 50 N. Y. Supp. 457; Wilson v. Hudson River Water Power & Paper Co. (1893) 71 Hun. 292, 24 N. Y. Supp. 1072; Sweeney v. Page (1892) 64 Hun. 172, 18 N. Y. Supp. 890; Collins v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. (1882) 30 Minn. 31, 14 N. W. 60.

Upon appeal, where the complaint has been dismissed, the plaintiff is entitled to the most favorable inferences to be drawn from the evidence. McCone v. Gallagher (1897) 16 App. Div. 272, 44 N. Y. Supp. 697.

Or a nonsuit may be ordered. McCarthy v. Bristol Shipowners' Co. (1883) Ir. L. R. 10 C. L. 384; Byrne v. Fennell (1882) Ir. L. R. 10 C. L. 397; Donovan v. Ferris (1900) 128 Cal. 48, 60 Pac. 519; Ryan v. McCully (1894) 123 Mo. 636, 27 S. W. 533; Judson v. Olean (1889) 26 N. Y. S. R. 706, 22 N. E. 555; Cole v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. (1893) 72 Hun. 467, 25 N. Y. Supp. 276; Dwyer v. Hall (1897) 21 Misc. 452, 47 N. Y. Supp. 630, Reversed in 20 Misc. 677, 46 N. Y. Supp. 533; Leary v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. (1894) 76 Hun. 575, 28 N. Y. Supp. 187; Mahoney v. Vacuum Oil Co. (1894) 76 Hun. 579, 28 N. Y. Supp. 196; Hoover v. Beech Creek R. Co. (1893) 154 Pa. 362, 26 Atl. 815; *Fowler v. Or a verdict may be directed for the defendant. Wigmore v. Jay (1860) 5 Exch. 354, 19 L. J. Exch. N. S. 296, 14 Jur. 837; Donovan v. Ferris (1900) 128 Cal. 48, 60 Pac. 519; Carroll v. Western U. Snow (1900) 106 Wis. 132, 81 N. W. 983.

In an action by an employee against a manufacturing corporation for personal injuries received while endeavoring to escape from its mill, which was on fire, it appeared that the fire was caused by the heating of a bearing on one of the machines used in the mill, and that it might have been readily extinguished when first discovered; that the defendant had a cistern with pipes leading to each story of the mill, to which were attached lines of hose, but at the time of the fire the water did not run when attempt was made to use it. It was held, in the absence of evidence of any reason why the water did not run, that it must be attributed to the negligence of the fellow servants of the plaintiff in failing to keep the apparatus in order, or in failing to put it in operation; and that the defendant was not liable. Jones v. Granite Mills (1878) 126 Mass. 84, 30 Am. Rep. 661. The court remarked that it was not called on to decide whether an employer was bound to provide precaution for the prevention of fire, or means for facilitating the escape of employees from a fire which had started, and proceeded thus: "Even if we assume that such obligations rest upon the employer, no evidence was offered tending to show that the defendant failed to take proper precautions to prevent fire, or that the hose, tanks, and other appliances for extinguishing it were not all that under any circumstances would be required. The evidence offered was simply that the water did not run, when the fellow servants of the plaintiff attempted to use it. This was not sufficient proof of negligence to charge the defendant. The defendant, in any aspect of the case, had done its whole duty when it supplied the proper appliances, the care and use of which must be necessarily intrusted to its servants. The failure of the water to run must therefore be attributed to the negligence of fellow servants, either in failing to keep the apparatus in proper order, or in negligently putting it in operation."

Where the evidence merely shows that whenever the hatchway through which the plaintiff fell was rightfully opened, it was by the order of the defendant or of a particular agent, and that in the latter case such agent always stood by it when it was open to guard against accidents, and that on the occasion in question it was opened without the knowledge or permission of such particular agent or of the defendant, and by the unauthorized act of a fellow servant of the deceased, the conclusion of law is, that the plaintiff was injured, not by the neglect or default of his employer, but of his fellow servant. Karl v. Maillard (1868) 3 Bosw. 501.

And if a verdict is rendered for the plaintiff on such evidence it should be set aside. Donnelly v. San Francisco Bridge Co. (1897) 117 Cal. 417, 49 Pac. 559; Langlois v. Maine C. R. Co. (1892) 84 Me. 161, 24 Atl. 804; Jarman v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (1893) 98 Mich. 135, 57 N. W. 32; Reichel v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1892) 130 N. Y. 682, 29 N. E. 763; Harley v. Buffalo Car Mfg. Co. (1894) 142 N. Y. 31, 36 N. E. 813; McDonald v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1892) 63 Hun. 587, 18 N. Y. Supp. 609; McCampbell v. Cunard S. S. Co. (1895) 144 N. Y. 532, 30 N. E. 637; Peschel v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1885) 62 Wis. 338, 21 N. W. 269.

Where, by agreement of the parties, the facts are left to a trial judge, in order that he, acting as a jury, may find what they were, it is not for a court of appeals to consider whether they would have found as he did, but whether his finding is so far wrong that they ought to set it aside. Charles v. Taylor (1878) L. R. 3 C. P. Div. 492, 38 L. T. N. S. 773, 27 Week. Rep. 32, per Brett, L. J.

Where the nonliability is thus clear, as a matter of law, it is error to instruct the jury that it is for them to say whether any negligence is to be imputed to the master. Hall v. United States Radiator Co. (1900) 52 App. Div. 90, 64 N. Y. Supp. 1002.

k. Explanation of classification of the cases cited in the ensuing sections.

The decisions regarding acts of negligence which are not regarded as constituting breaches of the nondelegable duties seem to be, broadly speaking, susceptible of classification under the categories indicated by the headings of the next three subtitles. But in many instances it is obviously impossible to say positively that a case belongs to one category rather than another. The arrangement adopted, therefore, is merely to be regarded as a convenient method of showing the effect of the enormous mass of materials with which we have to deal.

V. Negligence of coeservant involving merely the use of the instrumentalities; master not responsible for.

a. Orders respecting the use of the instrumentalities.

1. Generally.

The effect of the cases cited in the note to Stevens v. Chamberlin (1900; C. C. App. 1st C.) 51 L. R. A. 517-539, and 590-592, is that an order is not deemed to be given in a representative capacity, unless the employee giving it is a vice principal by virtue of his rank.

Other cases illustrating more directly the principle that a master is not liable merely for the reason that the negligence was committed on the giving of an order are cited in the following four subdivisions.

2. Order accompanied by an assurance of safety.

In an early English case it was laid down broadly that a workman is entitled to rely on the representations of a fellow workman whose province it is to inform him whether he can or cannot safely work in a certain place. Pater-son v. Wallace (1854) 1 Macq. H. L. Cas. 748. As the negligent servant in this case was an underground manager, and it was denied that such an employee was a vice principal in the more recent decision of Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, it would seem that such a ruling is equivalent to a declaration that, as to the function in question, he is the master's agent. The precise grounds upon which the earlier decision proceeds are, however, quite obscure, and it is extremely doubtful whether it can be reconciled with the principles laid down in Wilson v. Merry.

Some American cases also seem to treat the assurances of any employee who is in the exercise of control as being binding on the master, although for other purposes he may be a mere servant. Pool v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1892) 56 Wis. 227, 14 N. W. 46 (railway company bound by assurance of a servant in charge of a hand car, to a detective in the company's employ, that he might safely ride sitting upon the rear end of the car with his feet hanging over); Bradley v. New York C. R. Co. (1874) 3 Thomp. & C. 288 (trackmaster, as incident to his right to employ laborers, held to be authorized to give them an assurance that he will warn them as to the approach of trains); Floetti v. Third Ave. R. Co. (1896) 10 App. Div. 308, 41 N. Y. Supp. 792 (workman went under track in reliance on foreman's statement that no car would pass until a time much later than that at which the accident occurred); Mullane v. Houston, W. Street & P. Ferry Co. (1897) 21 Misc. 10, 46 N. Y. Supp. 957 (assurance by trackmaster of a street railway company to a workman under his control, to induce the latter to enter a hole which was dangerous while the cable was in operation, that he would order the engineer not to start the cable, held to be a matter pertaining to the duty of a master to provide a safe place of work, and not a mere detail of work within the functions of a fellow servant).

The first of the decisions cited involves, it will be observed, the element of a difference of department, and may be justified on that ground alone. The second is contrary in principle to those collected in V. f. infra, and on the facts cannot be reconciled with the rulings of the Supreme and circuit courts of the United States cited below. As to the third and fourth it is difficult to conceive of circumstances in which the injurious negligence could be more plainly that of a fellow servant than the acts of omission here in evidence. The places of work were perfectly safe except in so far as they were rendered insecure by the running of the car and the starting of the cable. If the foreman himself had operated the car or started the cable, the defendant would certainly not have been liable (see Crispin v. Babbitt [1880] 81 N. Y. 516, 37 Am. Rep. 521), and it seems impossible to argue that the failure to prevent another servant from doing these acts can be negligence of an essentially different quality.

The opposite theory of the quality of an order accompanied by an assurance is adopted in the cases cited below.

The orders of a section foreman to a laborer who is with him on a hand car, that he shall not look back to watch for a train, and assurance that the foreman himself will watch and give warning of any danger, do not make the master liable for an injury to the laborer resulting from the negligence of the foreman in failing to watch for the train. Martin v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1897) 166 U. S. 399, 41 L. ed. 1051, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 603.

One of two foremen of construction work acts as a mere coeservant of a subordinate in directing him to work at the base of an overhanging bank, and assuring him that he can work there in safety. Balch v. Haas (1896) 20 C. C. A. 151, 36 U. S. App. 693, 73 Fed. 974.

In Missouri it was held, at a time prior to the adoption of the superior servant doctrine (see note to O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. [1900; Minn.] 51 L. R. A. pp. 539 et seq.), that a railway was not any more bound by the assurances of a conductor that a rope was safe than by those of a fellow laborer of the plaintiff. McGowan v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. (1876) 61 Mo. 528.

The last two of the New York decisions cited above have been lately distinguished, not very successfully, in a case where it was held that the fact that, on plaintiff objecting to descending into a trench, defendant's foreman assured him it was safe, and that he would stand and watch, did not render defendant liable, since the foreman's assurance was merely as to the details of the work, given in his individual capacity, and not for the principal. Schott v. Onondaga County Sav. Bank (1900) 49 App. Div. 503, 63 N. Y. Supp. 631.

On the whole, therefore, the better opinion is believed to be that an assurance of safety is not an act which constitutes the employee giving it a representative of the master ad hoc viocem, but merely an act which is official in the sense that an employee who is a vice principal by virtue of his rank is regarded as giving it in the capacity of an agent of the master, and not of a mere servant. See, generally, note to O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900; Minn.) 51 L. R. A. pp. 586 et seq.

In the following cases the assurance emanated from one who was a vice principal in the jurisdictions mentioned, but the question whether it was an official act was not discussed. Goggin v. D. M. Osborne & Co. (1896) 115 Cal. 437, 47 Pac. 248 (local manager); Monahan v. Kansas City Clay & Coal Co. (1894) 58 Mo. App. 68 (foreman of mine); Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. McKee (1887) 37 Kan. 592, 15 Pac. 484 (superintendent); Jones v. St. Louis, N. & P. Packet Co. (1891) 43 Mo. App. 398 (second mate of ship); Nelson v. St. Paul Plow Works (1894) 57 Minn. 43, 58 N. W. 863 (superintendent); Heifensstein v. Medart (1896) 136 Mo. 595, 36 S. W. 963, 37 S. W. 829, 38 S. W. 294 (superintendent); Sopherstein v. Bertels (1896) 178 Pa. 401, 35 Atl. 1000 (superintendent).

b. Choice of particular methods of work.

See also V. c, d, h, o, 7, infra.

The general rule is that the master is not responsible for the errors which a servant of superior grade may commit in regard to the choice of methods for carrying out the work intrusted to his management.

The conductor of a freight train is a mere fellow servant with a brakeman on the train in determining not to apply for more brakemen, or set off cars from his train before proceeding down a steep grade, under a rule of the company committing to his judgment the question whether he shall make such application, where there is nothing unusual about the train. Wooden v. Western N. Y. & P. R. Co. (1895) 147 N. Y. 508, 42 N. E. 199, Reversing (1891) 43 N. Y. S. R. 218, 16 N. Y. Supp. 840 (1892) 46 N. Y. S. R. 77, 18 N. Y. Supp. 768. The court said: "The duty of the company, as of any other master, to its servants, was performed if it furnished adequate machinery and suitable appliances for the work, and employed competent fellow servants, under proper rules, duly promulgated and adapted to the end of meeting possible emergencies of an ordinary or extraordinary character, which might be foreseen to arise in the conduct of its operations. It is only when the duty to be performed is one which the master is supposed to do in person for his servant's safety in his place of work, that it cannot be delegated to another so as to free the master from responsibility for the consequences of some neglect. The duty here was not of that character. It related to the performance of a part of the servant's ordinary work, and was regulated by the rule and published notice."

A railway company is not liable for the decision of bridge carpenters to raise a heavy bridge pier by tackle, rather than in some other way, and to fasten that tackle in a certain way, and to omit to brace it while it was being raised. Ulrich v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1898) 25 App. Div. 465, 51 N. Y. Supp. 5.

The failure of a directing machinist, who was holding a torch, to suggest the danger of striking a driving-spring which was being placed in a locomotive, is not an omission of duty in the capacity of a vice principal. Kerner v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. (1897) 149 Ind. 21, 48 N. E. 364.

The mere fact that an employee held a stick of frozen duallin over a fire to thaw it will not support an action by a fellow employee against the master for injuries resulting from an explosion, upon the theory that the act itself showed that the employee was an unsuitable person for the master to have in his employment, where he was employed merely as a common laborer, and was acting at the time in pursuance of a direction for which the master was not responsible. McManus v. Staples (1898) 171 Mass. 150, 50 N. E. 537.

Directing a workman in a gang which is taking down a building to chop a post at a particular conjuncture is a mere detail of work. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Brown (1896) 20 C. C. A. 147, 84 U. S. App. 759, 73 Fed. 970.

The act of one who is superintending the putting up of an elevator in a building in process of construction, in determining when the measurements shall be taken in the upper floors, and how far the construction of the building shall progress before they are taken, is the act of a fellow servant with a workman in the employ of such company who is injured while taking a measurement under the direction of such superintendent. Whallon v. Sprague Electric Elevator Co. (1896) 1 App. Div. 264, 37 N. Y. Supp. 174.

of a staging which had been properly constructed and was adequate for the purposes for which it was intended and had been used, but fell by reason of the negligence of a fellow servant in taking it down, the master is not liable. Lefarge v. Berlin Mills Co. (1895) 68 N. H. 373, 44 Atl. 533.

A servant cannot recover where he was injured through the act of a fellow servant in taking down a trestle as a whole, instead of separating it and taking it down in sections. Cogan v. Burnham (1900) 175 Mass. 391, 56 N. E. 585.

No recovery can be had against an employer for an injury to an employee caused by the sudden fall of a frozen crust of ground on the employee while undermining the same, where the negligence, if any, in causing the crust to fall without warning was not that of the superintendent, but that of certain fellow servants who were driving wedges into the bank above. Gorman v. Woodbury (1899) 173 Mass. 180, 53 N. E. 373.

An employer is not liable for the negligence of a foreman in prematurely directing his subordinates to let go a telephone pole which was being taken down. Morgridge v. Providence Teleph. Co. (1898) 20 R. I. 386, 39 Atl. 328.

A laborer ordered to hold a bent fish plate in a certain position while the foreman endeavored to straighten it with a hammer cannot recover if he is injured through his compliance with the order. Lagrone v. Mobile & O. R. Co. (1890) 67 Miss. 502, 7 So. 551.

A direction to put powder into a hole without waiting a sufficient time for the hole to cool after giant powder had been exploded there is not deemed to have been given by a vice principal. Mast v. Kern (1898) 34 Or. 247, 54 Pac. 950.

c. Disposition of the force of employees available for the work in hand.

One special application of the general principle embodied in the cases cited in the last subdivision is observable in the rule that wherever the master has employed an adequate force of servants of a sufficient degree of skill and capacity, and furnished them with all the means which are essential for a proper discharge of their several duties, and the circumstances are such that the same number of men and the same degree of care are not always required, he is justified in leaving to them the exercise of their own discretion and judgment in the disposition and distribution of the force available.

No negligence can be imputed to a railway company for an omission to make regulations as to the number of brakemen to be sent on a train of detached cars when on its way to the repair track, and in what positions they should be placed. Hence, an accident due to the fact that there were too few brakemen on a particular train, and none at the rear end, will be held to be attributable, not to the negligence of the company, but to that of one or other of the employees engaged in distributing the cars. Basel v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1877) 70 N. Y. 171 (car repairer injured).

A railway company is not liable for the negligence of the foreman of a drill crew in sending a detached car along a track where other cars are being coupled, without stationing a brakeman upon it to control its movements. Central R. Co. v. Keegan (1895) 160 U. S. 259, 40 L. ed. 418, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269.

In Hussey v. Cogger (1899) 112 N. Y. 614, 3 L. R. A. 559, 20 N. E. 556, where the plaintiff was injured through the negligence of some of his fellow servants, the court reasoned thus: "It was no part of the duty of the master to remove hatches, or direct the particular mode of doing so, any more than to direct workmen in the use of the tools with which they performed their work. There were customary and established modes of performing such services, and each employee was expected to do his work in the manner and style to which he was accustomed, without special directions in respect thereto. It was entirely immaterial whether the superintendent undertook to perform the work of removing hatches, or ordered it to be done by others; he was, in either case, engaged in performing the duty of a workman. The master had furnished abundant help to do the work, and had done all that was required of him, and it was the fault of the servants that a sufficient number did not co-operate to perform it safely, or do it in the manner prescribed by custom."

d. Assigning servants to work for which they are unfitted.

It has been held that there can be no recovery for negligence of this description in cases where the unfitness was the cause of injury to the unfit person himself.

Where the act alleged to have directly resulted in injury was that of a fellow servant in requiring the plaintiff to lift beyond his strength, no breach of the master's duty to supply a safe place of work or safe instrumentalities is involved. The issue presented is merely one of the manner in which a servant employed a proper instrument of work. Robertson v. Chicago & E. R. Co. (1896) 146 Ind. 486, 45 N. E. 655.

Nor can there be recovery where the negligence with which it is sought to charge the master consisted in allowing the unfit person whose acts were the direct cause of the injury to undertake duties which he was incapable of performing properly.

A railway company is not liable for an injury to a brakeman caused by the negligence of the engineer in placing his unskilled fireman temporarily in the performance of his duties in handling the engine. South Florida R. Co. v. Price (1893) 32 Fla. 46, 13 So. 638; Parriah v. Pensacola & A. R. Co. (1891) 28 Fla. 251, 9 So. 696; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Myers (1881) 55 Tex. 110.

It is clear, however, that nonliability cannot, in cases of the latter class, be predicated except where the change of functions was allowed without any authority, express or implied, from the master. The decisions cited in III. b, supra, with regard to such negligence, show that, if the change was made by an official who had the power to make it, the circumstances are controlled by the doctrine that the duty to employ competent servants is nondelegable.

e. Negligence in sending servants into abnormally dangerous places without warning.

See, however, III. c, supra.

Several decisions embody the principle that an employee who, in the exercise of superintendence, sends a subordinate to perform his duties in a place where he will be exposed to a specific peril due to conditions which have arisen in carrying out the executive details of the work, acts as a mere fellow servant of such subordinate in giving the order without warning him of the existence of the peril. The leading case on this point is Cullen v. Norton (1891) 126 N. Y. 1, 26 N. E. 905. There the plaintiff's decedent was employed by defendant as a laborer in his cement quarry, and was engaged in drilling rock for blasting purposes under the defendant's foreman. Prior to the accident, eleven holes had been drilled in a piece of rock, and charged and fired, but only ten of them exploded. The foreman examined the unexploded hole and found the fuse unconsumed, but failed to remove it. The next morning he directed two of the workmen to drill holes in the rock, within 2 feet of the undischarged hole, and at the same time ordered the deceased to drill 20 or 30 feet below. The exposed fuse shortly after in some way ignited the charge, which exploded and threw a mass of rock on the deceased. Upon these facts the trial judge dismissed the complaint. This judgment was reversed by the supreme court ([1889] 52 Hun, 9, 4 N. Y. Supp. 774) on the ground that the foreman was the representative of the employer in regard to furnishing the plaintiff with a safe place to work. At the second trial the plaintiff had a verdict, and the judgment therein was affirmed by the supreme court ([1890] 29 N. Y. S. R. 700, 9 N. Y. Supp. 174) on a theory of the evidence thus explained by Landon, J.: "The rule requiring the master to protect his servant from the known and inherent dangers of the situation includes those reasonably to be apprehended. Because the carelessness of fellow servants in such a situation is not to be reasonably apprehended, the master may escape the consequences arising from that peril. But if it was reasonable to apprehend a premature explosion from some other cause, then the master's care and prudence should have protected the intestate from it; the foreman was his only representative to act for him, and the jury have found that he not only failed to exercise that care, but actually did with respect to the intestate what ordinary care should have restrained him from doing. Leonard v. Collins (1877) 70 N. Y. 90. It may be conceded that the distinction between the dangerous nature of the employment and the dangerous nature of the place of employment is not always clearly perceived. We . . . hazard the illustration: Suppose the place is a rock in a mine, and the work is the picking out of explosive powder from the hole of an undischarged blast in the rock. The place, aside from the nature of this particular work, is safe, but the work is unsafe and dangerous in the extreme. If an explosion results from the work, and injures the servant, the injury is plainly attributable to the work, and not to the place. But suppose, while engaged in this dangerous work, an overhanging rock, gradually becoming loosened, now falls upon the servant and kills him, his death is attributable to the place, and the inquiry would be pertinent whether his master was negligent in assigning him to such a place. Again, suppose the workman is extracting the powder from the blast, as in the first supposition, and the danger is incident only to the nature of his work, and the master, with knowledge of the situation, directs a second workman to drill a new hole in the same rock near to the one upon which the first workman is employed. Clearly, with respect to the second workman, the place is a dangerous one, wholly irrespective of his own employment. As is repeated in Hussey v. Coger (1889) 112 N. Y. 614, 3 L. R. A. 559, 20 N. E. 556, the master owes the duty to his servants to furnish a safe and proper place in which to prosecute his work, and to exercise care and prudence in the protection of his servants from the known and inherent dangers of the situation." In the court of appeals ([1891] 126 N. Y. 1, 26 N. E. 905) the judgment was reversed, on the ground that the "master furnished the mine as a place for labor, and it was solely on account of the manner in which the foreman, a fellow servant, performed the work, or directed it, that the accident happened, and happened in the course of the performance of the very kind and character of work which the plaintiff's intestate took the risk of by accepting employment." The following extract from the opinion shows that the different conclusions arrived at by the two courts were due to the fact that the effect of the evidence was viewed by each of them from essentially different standpoints: "If Doran acted as master, the defendant is liable, while, if he acted in his capacity as an employee, and not as a representative of the master, his negligence does not rest upon the master. The quarry was the place where the work was to go on, and the master was bound to make it a reasonably safe place for such work, considering its character and the necessarily dangerous nature of the work itself. For the manner in which the persons employed in the quarry should themselves perform their work the master was not liable. It is not claimed that the master did not furnish a proper place to work in the first instance; that is, when the deceased was employed, the quarry was as safe as any quarry is where frequent blasts are being fired off. But the manner of the performance of each of the various details of the work by which, as a whole, it was to be conducted, rested necessarily upon the intelligence and care and fidelity of the servants to whom these duties were intrusted. It can't be that every time a blast was exploded, and the men came back, the manner of their distribution for work was a duty of the master, and that the order of a foreman, mistakenly or negligently given, must be regarded as the order of the master in filling a duty to furnish a safe place to work in. It is, as it seems to me, a detail of the working or management of the business, the risks attending which have been assumed by the party taking employment."

The circuit court of appeals has also rendered a similar decision, holding that a foreman of a gang of men engaged in constructing a sewer under the supervision of general superintendents is not a special vice principal, so as to render the city liable to one of such men injured in consequence of the negligence of such foreman in directing such man to reload holes drilled for blasting, without telling him that the person who loaded them, and was about to clean them out, had said that the dynamite in one of them had not exploded. Minneapolis v. Lundin (1893) 7 C. C. A. 344, 19 U. S. App. 245, 58 Fed. 525. The court reasoned thus: "The duty of the master to furnish a safe place for the performance of work does not require it to keep that place safe under the constantly changing conditions which the performance of such a work as the construction of a sewer necessitates. The city furnished a street in which it was safe to construct a sewer. The comparative safety of the place where each man worked was necessarily constantly varied by the progress of the work, and the duty of the master did not extend to keeping every place where each workman labored safe at every moment of its progress. It was the duty of each workman to use reasonable care to so render his service that the place in which he and his fellow servants were required to labor should continue to be reasonably safe. It was the duty of the foreman to so direct the work of excavating, of laying the pipe, and of filling the trench that it would continue to be reasonably safe for every man in his crew to render the service assigned to him. But these were personal duties imposed upon the workmen and the foreman by their employment in the common service, and not by the delegation to them of the performance of any absolute duty of the master. The street originally furnished by the city was safe. The trench in which the rock was to be blasted was originally safe for the blasting of rock. If the safe place originally furnished by the city became unsafe in the progress of the work, it was rendered so, not by any negligence of the city or its superintendent in furnishing it, but by the acts or negligence of the foreman and his workmen in discharging the duties imposed upon them by their common employment, and for these acts and this negligence the city was not responsible."

A master who provided a skilful foreman and competent fellow workman, with necessary and proper appliances and tools for the removal of fragments of stone after a blast, is not liable for injuries sustained by an employee because the foreman omitted to give him notice to pry off the piece of rock that fell and hit him, instead of going to work directly under it. Perry v. Rogers (1898) 157 N. Y. 251, 51 N. E. 1021, Reversing (1895) 91 Hun, 248, 36 N. Y. Supp. 208.

The fact that a master personally directed a servant to go to work with a gang who cleared up at night the débris caused by blasting in the daytime will not enable the servant to recover for injuries occasioned by the fall of a rock loosened by such blasting, where competent workmen, a skilled foreman, and safe appliances were furnished. Capasso v. Woolfolk (1900) 163 N. Y. 472, 57 N. E. 780, Reversing (1898) 25 App. Div. 234, 49 N. Y. Supp. 409; (Perry v. Rogers [1898] 157 N. Y. 251, 51 N. E. 1021, supra, was followed).

In like manner, the negligence of a foreman in directing a common laborer employed to drill holes for blasting to draw an unexploded charge, without warning him as to the kind of explosive used, or instructing him in the way of handling it, is that of a fellow servant merely. Vitto v. Farley (1895) 15 Misc. 153, 36 N. Y. Supp. 1105. The decision was based on the ground that the direction related to a mere "detail of the work intrusted to the judgment and discretion of the foreman," and that the "method to be employed was left entirely to the foreman."

It is often quite difficult to decide whether cases of this type should be referred to the principle illustrated by the above decisions, or to the principle that the duty of instruction is nondelegable. A very slight change in the standpoint from which the evidence is considered will suffice to throw the facts on one side or the other of the line. In a very close case it was held by a divided court that an employee owning a coal dock, the structures and machinery upon which are undergoing repairs and rebuilding, made necessary by a storm, is not guilty of negligence in failing to warn a new and inexperienced employee, at work upon a chute, of the presence in such chute of the slack of a cable attached to the machinery of the dock, and of the danger of its suddenly lifting by the starting of the machinery, where the machinery is not in regular operation, and such lifting of the cable is not one of the incidents of such operation, regularly or occasionally occurring, but arises from the engineer's adjusting the cable upon the drums and leaving it for a time lying in the chute, and plaintiff's position is safe until the starting of the engine, and the employer has no notice of the presence of the cable in the chute, and cannot reasonably anticipate it.—especially where such employee is not ordered to take a position over the chute. Porter v. Silver Creek & M. Coal Co. (1893) 84 Wis. 418, 54 N. W. 1019. The majority of the court reasoned thus: "In the course of the engineer's work the cable was for a time lying in the chute. He started the engine and drew it up, and thus made the plaintiff's position over the chute dangerous, while a moment before it was entirely safe. The cable was never in the coal chute in the ordinary course of the business, but was always far above the chute. No official or superintending officer of the company knew of the fact that the cable was in the chute, or was liable to be there, or ordered it put there. It was out of the usual course of business, and could not reasonably be anticipated. Nor was the plaintiff directed to take the position which he did over the chute. Certainly, the defendant could not be held to be obliged to warn the plaintiff of a danger which no one could reasonably anticipate." Two judges dissented on the ground that the master was bound to know that the machinery might start at any moment, and imperil the plaintiff. Compare the reasoning of the supreme court in Cullen v. Norton (1891) 126 N. Y. 1, 26 N. E. 905, as quoted supra.

On the whole this seems to be the correct theory of the evidence. The rule as to details of work being based essentially on the hypothesis of an assumption of the risks involved in the given operations, it is manifestly a prerequisite to its application, that those risks should have been understood by the injured servant. If it is a permissible inference from the evidence that, for some special reason, either quoad personam or quoad res, he did not understand those risks, and his want of comprehension was excusable, it is difficult to admit that the case is not one in which the jury should at least be called upon to say whether, under the circumstances, a duty of instruction should be predicated. The objection to the view of the majority of the judges is that the consideration mainly relied upon, vis., that the event which caused the injury was not one which the master had reason to anticipate was scarcely one which a court of review was, under the circumstances, shown by the record warranted in making the basis of a peremptory inference of fact. If there was no evidence, or insufficient evidence, on this point, the proper course, it is submitted, would have been to send back the case to the trial court for further investigation.

f. Failing to warn servants as to dangers arising from the execution of the details of the work.

The general principle that the master's duty to provide a safe place of work is not deemed to have been violated, where the unsafety is caused solely by the acts of co-servants in carrying out the details of the work, clearly involves the corollary that the master is not chargeable with the failure of those servants to warn each other as to the existence of dangerous conditions which have already supervened.

A railroad company is not liable for injuries to a brakeman, caused by the neglect of a flagman in not giving due notice of rails torn up for repairs. Cooper v. Milwaukee & P. du Ch. R. Co. (1869) 23 Wis. 668.

The roadmaster of a railroad, directing the work of tearing down a bridge, is not the vice principal of the employer to the extent that his omission to give a particular warning of a detail thereof which portends danger would render the master liable for his omissions in that respect. O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900) 80 Minn. 27, 51 L. R. A. 532, 82 N. W. 1086 (plaintiff caught by a bolt which had not been drawn from a stringer of a trestle which he was helping to remove).

An employer is not liable for the death of an employee, caused by the blowing off of a door of a blast stove while he was engaged in tightening a nut on it, where there was no danger in working at the door unless the blast was on, and of that fact he was ignorant, solely through the neglect of his coemployee, under whose direction he was working. Dahlke v. Illinois Steel Co. (1898) 100 Wis. 431, 76 N. W. 362.

III. p. supra, seem to be agreed that a master is not liable for the negligence of a servant in failing to notify a coemployee of the approach of a transitory peril which, as the work progresses, will render the environment unsafe for a brief period, but which may easily be avoided if due warning is given. In some of the cases illustrating this principle the breach of duty was committed by failing to notify the injured servant himself that his safety was imperiled by the particular peril in question.

The negligence of a section foreman in failing to note an approaching train, and to give the proper warning, so that a hand car may be taken from the track, is not the omission of a duty which the railroad company owes, as master, to one of the gang. Martin v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1897) 166 U. S. 399, 41 L. ed. 1051, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 608. "We do not perceive," said the court, "that the doctrine as to the duty of the master to furnish a safe place for the servant to work in has the slightest application to the facts of this case. There is no intimation in the evidence, nor is any claim made, that the hand car upon which the plaintiff was riding was not properly equipped and in good repair, and in every way fit for the purpose for which it was used. It was a perfectly safe and proper means of transit in and of itself from the station at Albuquerque to the point where the plaintiff was going to work."

If the car were rendered unsafe, it was not by reason of any lack of diligence on the part of the defendant in providing a proper car, but the danger arose simply because a fellow servant of the plaintiff failed to discharge his own duty in watching for the approach of a train from the south."

A trainmaster, who orders cars to be taken out of a train without notice to a brakeman engaged in making a coupling acts as a fellow servant of such brakeman. Martin v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1895) 65 Fed. 384.

The duty of warning servants that a blast is about to be fired in a quarry does not belong to the nondelegable class. Donovan v. Ferris (1900) 128 Cal. 48, 60 Pac. 519; Gallagher v. McMullin (1898) 25 App. Div. 571, 49 N. Y. Supp. 734 (warning not given in time).

There can be no recovery, where an engineer, without warning, moved cars again after they had come to a stop against another car to which a brakeman was about to couple them. Long v. Coronado R. Co. (1892) 96 Cal. 209, 31 Pac. 170.

The negligence of an employee intrusted with the duty of warning other employees of the starting of machinery is not imputed to the employer. Portance v. Lehigh Valley Coal Co. (1899) 101 Wis. 574, 77 N. W. 875; New Pittsburgh Coal & Coke Co. v. Peterson (1896) 14 Ind. App. 634, 43 N. E. 270; Cole Bros. v. Wood (1894) 11 Ind. App. 60, 36 N. E. 1074.

One under whose direction a carpenter is working upon a ladder in front of a car stable, who promises to remain at the foot of the ladder to give the workman notice whenever it is necessary to remove the ladder in order to permit the cars or a cart to pass in or out of the stable, does not represent the master. Byrnes v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. (1899) 36 App. Div. 355, 55 N. Y. Supp. 269.

Where a servant undertakes the work of putting damaged cars on a certain track in a yard, the receipt of insufficient notice as to the precise defect in some particular car which he has to handle is to be treated as the neglect of a fellow servant, and the risk must fall within the ordinary rule inasmuch as it is an incident of the service which was entered upon, that broken cars might be put in the wrong place in the yard, and insufficient notice of the defects in them might be given. Such an omission of notice relates to matters of detail, and is one which cannot be given in advance. It is therefore not like an omission to give instructions to an inexperienced hand as to the general danger to which his work will expose him. Yeaton v. Boston & L. R. Corp. (1883) 135 Mass. 418.

Trainmen engaged in switching cars act as fellow servants in failing to give notice to a car repairer at work on one of the tracks of their approach. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Campbell (1894; Tex. Civ. App.) 39 S. W. 1104.

A railroad company which has provided watchmen to guard a car repairer from danger while at work is not liable to him for an injury resulting from their failure to warn him of an approaching train. Luebke v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1885) 63 Wis. 91, 53 Am. Rep. 266, 23 N. W. 136 (on the first appeal—[1883; 59 Wis. 127, 17 N. W. 870]),—the judgment of the lower court had been reversed on the ground that it had not been shown that the company had performed its duty of furnishing a watchman; Rex v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. (1897) 2 Marv. (Del.) 337, 43 Atl. 246. In the latter case, the court said, in the course of an oral charge: "The giving of notice of the approach of danger where it does not enter into the creation of, or the maintenance of, a safe place, is not necessarily a primary duty of the master, but a secondary duty, so to speak, which may be delegated to competent fellow servants under proper rules. Notice is sometimes an incident to the safety of the place; a matter of executive detail, which ordinarily must, of necessity, in operating large establishments, be intrusted to some independent human will other than that of the master; upon the faithfulness of which will, in the performance of duty it is reasonable to rely."

The negligence of a motorman in disobeying a rule of the company requiring those in charge of its cars to give timely warning of their approach to a track crew is not chargeable to the company as a violation of its duty to use reasonable care to provide a safe place for the trackman to do his work. Lundquist v. Duluth Street R. Co. (1896) 65 Minn. 387, 67 N. W. 1006.

The failure of a hatchtender to discharge his duty of giving warning to the servants in the hold below, that a bale is about to be thrown down, is not negligence which is imputable to the shipowner. Ocean S. S. Co. v. Cheaney (1890) 86 Ga. 278, 12 S. E. 351.

The failure of an employee to perform his duty of giving due warning that a piece of timber has been placed in the chute which conveys it to a ship is the negligence of a mere fellow servant of the workmen on board. Hermann v. Port Blakely Mill Co. (1896) 71 Fed. 853.

A contractor engaged in the business of altering and repairing vessels is not liable for the failure of his superintendent to warn the men working in the hold that a hatch is about to be removed. Hussey v. Coger (1889) 112 N. Y. 614, 3 L. R. A. 559, 20 N. E. 556 (hatch escaped from the hands of the workmen).

The negligence of the superintendent in charge of work under a construction contract in replying in the affirmative to the question of an employee who was throwing down blocks from a height to the workmen below, whether it was clear below, resulting in an injury to a workman employed below, is not chargeable to the master. Donnelly v. San Francisco Bridge Co. (1897) 117 Cal. 417, 49 Pac. 559.

In the absence of an express agreement, one employed to repair an elevator is not entitled to warning from the master when the elevator is about to start, where he relies upon a fellow servant, whom he has requested to give such warning. Mann v. O'Sullivan (1899) 126 Cal. 61, 58 Pac. 375.

In other cases the delinquency consisted essentially in an omission to convey to the co-servant whose act was the immediate cause of the injury such information as would have enabled him to avoid inflicting the injury.

The omission of a foreman of track repairers to set a lookout is not negligence which can be imputed to the company. Duthie v. Caledonian R. Co. (1898) 25 Sc. Sess. 4th series, 934.

A railway company is not liable for the failure of a yard foreman to place a signal flag in front of the cars upon the repair track, so as to prevent any other train from coupling on to such car while said signal was displayed, the result being that a car repairer was injured by the coupling of a train. Peterson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1887) 67 Mich. 102, 34 N. W. 260.

That the failure to warn servants as to transitory dangers is regarded as official negligence in an employee who is a vice principal by virtue of his rank, see note to O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900; Minn.) 51 L. R. A. 592, 593.

g. Absence from the post of duty.

A master who employs a sufficient number of servants is not liable for an injury to an employee caused by the temporary absence of a co-employee from a post of duty without any fault on the part of the employer. Reichel v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1892) 130 N. Y. 682, 29 N. E. 768.

The absence of a brakeman from cars shunted without an engine is the negligence of a co-servant, and not of the railroad company, where the latter has employed sufficient and competent brakemen to do such work, and they are present in the yard at the time of the accident. Potter v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1892) 136 N. Y. 77, 32 N. E. 603. The court distinguished Filke v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1873) 53 N. Y. 549, 13 Am. Rep. 545, where the missing brakeman did not present himself for duty at all, and intimated a doubt as to the correctness of Murphy v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1890) 118 N. Y. 527, 23 N. E. 812.

h. Selecting an imperfect appliance from the stock available.

Compare cases cited in V. b. supra.

It is well settled that, where the master has provided an adequate and readily accessible stock of suitable appliances in good condition from which to make a selection, and the imperfection of an instrumentality selected therefrom is, or ought to be, apparent to the servant who selects it, the master cannot be held responsible for injuries which are sustained by the use of that instrumentality, whether the sufferer be the servant himself who makes the selection, or a coemployee.

There can be no recovery where the field superintendent of a natural gas company, whose duty it was to shut in and test wells, was injured by an explosion due to his selection of a valve too weak to bear the pressure. Toohy v. Equitable Gas Co. (1897) 179 Pa. 437, 36 Atl. 314.

An employer is not liable for an injury to an employee caused by the breaking of a plank while putting a tank in position, where such plank was selected by the employee and his foreman while employed in the same service with him. Mahoney v. Vacuum Oil Co. (1894) 78 Hun, 579, 28 N. Y. Supp. 196.

A molder working by the day in a foundry, frequently called upon to assist in pouring heated metal into molds, is a fellow servant of an employee who made the molds, and cannot recover for injuries sustained by him by the escape of heated metal, due to the use of an imperfect flask in making the mold, where numerous flasks were provided, and the employee was not required to use an imperfect one. Kehoe v. Allen (1892) 92 Mich. 464, 52 N. W. 740.

In Cregan v. Marston (1891) 126 N. Y. 568, 27 N. E. 952, where the controversy was as to whose duty it was to observe and examine the condition of a rope, and change it when so worn that it became unsafe, the court explained its position as follows: "It is conceded that the defendants kept on hand and ready for use at any moment an adequate supply of these falls, and of the best and most approved character.

... If one was wanted, word was sent to the office, and the new fall at once supplied, for use at the dock. Usually the engineer or his assistant made the application, but anybody engaged in the work could give the notice and get the new fall. It does not appear that any such application coming from any of the workmen, therefore, were left in a position of perfect safety as to the sufficiency of the falls against everything save their own negligence or error of judgment. The rope was swinging before their eyes, and would disclose its approaching weakness on the surface before it became rotten or pulpy within, and they were able to know how long it had been used, and so whether prudence required it to be changed. They were at liberty, and knew they were at liberty, to supplant one which exhibited marks of weakness with another both new and sufficient, from the supply kept on hand. They were in the daily habit of observing its condition, and it was specially the custom of the engineer to do so. He had examined it a day or two before the accident, and deemed it safe." On this state of facts it was held out that the negligence of the engineer, if it existed, was not that of the master.

In Ling v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1892) 50 Minn. 160, 52 N. W. 378, the court thus explained its reasons for holding that a master is not responsible to a servant for the act of a fellow servant in negligently selecting from a number of those available an iron hook which was broken and unfit for use, to which to attach a pulley to raise a heavy weight in a boiler shop: "It is very apparent from the case that when, for this or like purposes, it became desirable or necessary for the boiler makers and their assistants to resort to the mechanical aid of a pulley, it was a part of their duty to consider where, under the circumstances relating to its use, they would fasten or anchor the pulley, and the means by which they would do it. To illustrate, it was not the legal duty of the defendant towards these mechanics, as their master, to direct them whether to make their pulley fast to the crown sheet over the fire box, or to use a timber for that purpose, or as to whether they should use a hook, of one form or another, an eye bolt, or some other means of making it fast. It was not a part of the absolute duty of the master to provide the particular simple instrument or thing which should be used for such a purpose. That was a part of the very duty which the mechanics were to themselves perform. The defendant provided the means which might be necessary to enable the mechanics to do what was thus required of them. If there was not at hand such a thing as might be necessary to fasten the pulley in position for use, they could have it made by the blacksmith. But the evidence shows conclusively that there were enough hooks lying about the shop fit for this purpose, which might have been selected and used. The accident occurred from the fact that whoever procured this hook neglected to observe, as he might have done, that it was broken and unfit for use. It does not appear who did this. There is no reason to presume, even as a matter of fact, that the foreman did it, rather than the boiler maker Brennan, or one of his helpers. But, while much attention is given to this matter in the argument of the appellant, we deem it to be of no consequence whether the boiler maker or the foreman was the person who negligently selected this particular hook and put it in position for use. In either case this was a part, a mere detail, of the work which these mechanics were employed to perform, and, whether done by the foreman, boiler maker, or a helper, whatever negligence there may have been in selecting the broken hook was the negligence of a fellow servant, and the plaintiff cannot recover from this defendant."

Recovery has been also denied where a fellow servant selected the following articles: A rope (Prescott v. Ball Engine Co. [1896] 176 Pa. 459, 35 Atl. 224); a buggy for conveying iron (Bemis v. Roberts [1891] 143 Pa. 1, 21 Atl. 998); a coupling pin that was too short (Thyng v. Fitchburg R. Co. [1892] 156 Mass. 13, 30 N. E. 169); a defective link for coupling cars (Young v. Boston & M. R. Co. [1897] 168 Mass. 219, 46 N. E. 624); a defective hammer by a fellow servant (Rawley v. Colliau [1892] 90 Mich. 31, 51 N. W. 350); appliances for supporting and steadying a heavy iron structure which was being hoisted (Ludlow v. Groton Bridge & Mfg. Co. [1896] 11 App. Div. 452, 42 N. Y. Supp. 343, previous proceedings reported in [1895] 71 N. Y. S. R. 510, 38 N. Y. Supp. 452, new trial denied in [1896] 16 Misc. 222, 37 N. Y. Supp. 595); an imperfect plank upon which to walk from a car to a shed into which it is being unloaded (Van den Heuvel v. National Furnace Co. [1893] 84 Wis. 636, 54 N. W. 1016); portions of a derrick employed in stone-setting. Harms v. Sullivan (1878) 1 Ill. App. 251.

One common variety of negligent selection consists in the use of an instrumentality which is safe and adequate for the purpose which was contemplated by the master when he supplied it, but which is dangerous or inadequate when used for the work to which it was actually applied. Carroll v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (1893) 160 Mass. 152, 35 N. E. 456; Meehan v. Speirs Mfg. Co. (1899) 172 Mass. 375, 52 N. E. 518; Durgin v. Munson (1864) 9 Allen, 396, 85 Am. Dec. 770; The Persian Monarch (1893) 5 C. C. A. 117, 14 U. S. App. 158, 55 Fed. 333, Reversing (1892) 49 Fed. 669; Maber v. Thropp (1896) 59 N. J. L. 186, 35 Atl. 1057.

An employer who furnishes safe and suitable appliances to the employee with which to do the work on which he is engaged is not responsible for injuries caused by defects in appliances substituted by a fellow servant for those furnished by the employer. Campbell v. New Jersey Dry Dock & Transp. Co. (1898) 61 N. J. L. 382, 39 Atl. 658.

The selection of an article from a supply of suitable material to be taken away and used at a distance has been held to be distinguishable from the selection of such an article from materials on hand at the place of work, and to be done in the performance of the nondelegable duty of furnishing appliances. Thomas v. Ann Arbor R. Co. (1897) 114 Mich. 59, 72 N. W. 40.

1. Failing to use the instrumentalities furnished by the master.

Another kind of dereliction of duty which is regarded as characteristic of a servant, and not of the master, is that which consists in the failure of a fellow servant to make use of suitable appliances furnished by the master for the work in hand.

A master who provides a proper apparatus to prevent a tub from falling back into a pit from which it is to be hoisted when full of earth is not liable for an injury caused by the failure of a fellow servant to use that apparatus. Griffiths v. Gidlow (1858) 3 Hurlst. & N. 648, 27 L. J. Exch. N. S. 404.

A brewer cannot be held culpable on the ground that he did not furnish proper appliances, where he sent his men to a customer's cellar with the usual apparatus for elevating barrels, and the men, finding the apparatus could not be used on account of the narrowness of the cellar, proceeded on their own responsibility to lift the barrels without it. Ramsay v. Robin (1889) 16 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 690.

A bridge builder is not liable where a foreman of a bridge gang injures a subordinate by his failure to use the braces furnished for enabling the workmen to move a heavy piece of the structure with greater safety. Ludlow v. Grotton Bridge & Mfg. Co. (1896) 11 App. Div. 452, 42 N. Y. Supp. 343.

A servant cannot recover for personal injuries where the defect complained of is the want of a gang plank at the side door of a car into which he was helping to load a machine, when it is not shown that a suitable gang plank was not furnished. Trimble v. Whitin Mach. Works (1898) 172 Mass. 150, 51 N. E. 463.

An employer is not liable for an injury caused by the breaking of a derrick from the lack of guy ropes to prevent swinging of the article hoisted, where there was rope on the premises which might have been used as guy ropes, but which the fellow servants of the injured employee neglected to use. Clark v. Riter-Conley Co. (1899) 89 App. Div. 598, 57 N. Y. Supp. 758.

Under the Pennsylvania statutes of 1877 and 1883, which merely require mine owners to furnish a sufficient number of props for the tunnels, a miner cannot recover if the evidence shows that a roof which fell and injured him would not have fallen if a single prop had been put in by the "boss." Reese v. Biddle (1886) 112 Pa. 72, 8 Atl. 813. Compare Hall v. Johnson (1865) 3 Hurlst. & C. 589, 34 L. J. Exch. N. S. 222, 11 Jur. N. S. 180, 11 L. T. N. S. 779, 13 Week. Rep. 411, where a miner was held not to be entitled to recover for an injury due to the negligence of an underlooker in omitting to see that the roof of the mine was propped safely, though here the point of view was not quite the same, as the essence of the decision was that the delinquent was not a vice principal by virtue of his rank.

An employer is not liable for an injury to a servant caused by the giving way of a belt fastener, due to the use of an insufficient number of fasteners in splicing the belt, where it keeps on hand a large quantity of such fasteners, and the failure to use a sufficient number is due to the negligence of his coemployees. Harley v. Buffalo Car Mfg. Co. (1894) 142 N. Y. 81, 36 N. E. 813.

An employer who acts as his own superintendent in the work of excavating a tunnel, and furnishes proper appliances for securing the safety of laborers who are to be lowered into it by a shaft leading into it, is not liable for an injury caused by the negligent omission of one of his subordinates to deliver those appliances at the mouth of the shaft. McAndrews v. Burns (1876) 39 N. J. L. 117. See, however, VI. 1, 1, 3, infra.

A ship owner which supplies, and has on hand, fenders and a gang plank, the use of which will render safe the unloading of the ship, 54 L. R. A.

is not liable for an injury to an employee caused by the failure of the stevedore, who superintends the unloading, to use the same. Flynn v. Maine S. S. Co. (1895) 14 Misc. 446, 85 N. Y. Supp. 1031.

A railroad employee cannot recover against the company for injuries caused by the neglect of the engineer or fireman in failing to have sand in the dome of the engine, on the ground of the company's failure to provide safe ways and appliances. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Jones (1894; Miss.) 16 So. 300.

The failure to provide a headlight renders a railway company liable to an employee who suffers injury through such failure; but it is not liable to the person injured for the failure of the men on the engine to light the one provided. Collins v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. (1882) 30 Minn. 31, 14 N. W. 60.

Negligence cannot be imputed to an employer on account of the absence of lights from the place of work where torches are furnished which may be used by the employees if they so desire. Kaare v. Troy Steel & I. Co. (1893) 139 N. Y. 369, 34 N. E. 901.

j. Negligence in failing to discard a defective for a suitable instrumentality.

In some cases of the class reviewed in the two preceding subdivisions the evidence indicates a breach of the duty to discard a defective appliance and replace it by a sound one, as well as a breach of the duty to use the appliances furnished.

The effect of considering the master's responsibility from this standpoint is discussed in VII. d, infra.

k. Using instrumentalities in a manner not contemplated nor authorized by the master.

A master who has furnished sufficient and suitable instrumentalities is not liable for the injuries which one servant may receive from the negligence of another in selecting for the performance of the work a particular instrumentality, which, though sufficient in itself, was not adapted to the purpose for which it was used.

In Carroll v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (1893) 160 Mass. 152, 35 N. E. 456, holding a telegraph company not to be liable for the fall of a pole upon an employee engaged in raising it, due to the slipping of the pole upon a shovel with pointed end, directed by the foreman to be used instead of a crutch, which had broken, the court said: "We assume that the shovel was not a proper tool for the purpose, but it was not furnished for the purpose by the defendant. The plaintiff, as we understand, contends that his party was reduced to using it by the breaking of the deadman and the absence of other tools, coupled with the fact that the pole was to be raised at that time, and thus that the defendant was responsible for the situation. The short answer is that there is no evidence that the defendant did not furnish a sufficiency of proper tools at the depot from which those which were used were taken, or within convenient reach, and that, when proper appliances of this sort are furnished by the employer within convenient reach in a case like the present, he has done his whole duty, and is not bound to see that every gang of workmen take as many tools as the event may show to have been desirable."

A steamship is not liable for injuries to an experienced stevedore by the giving way of the guy rope of a derrick improperly used by such stevedore and his coemployees in hauling a vessel alongside, where the derrick was not intended for that purpose. The Persian Monarch

(1893) 5 C. C. A. 117, 14 U. S. App. 158, 55 Fed. 333, Reversing (1892) 49 Fed. 669.

An employer is not liable for injuries to a painter in his employ by the breaking of a defective plank which his foreman has placed in position and directed such painter to pass over for the purpose of removing a scaffold, where the plank was not furnished by the employer for such use. Butterworth v. Clarkson (1893) 3 Misc. 338, 22 N. Y. Supp. 714.

To this head may be referred those cases in which it has been held that a servant who is responsible for a fellow workman's use of a temporary makeshift contrivance during the progress of the work does not represent the master as regards the furnishing of that contrivance.

An experienced carpenter, who, without making any examination, stands on a box handed to him by his vice principal, who to his knowledge had made no examination thereof, assumes the risk of the box not being strong enough to bear his weight. Soutar v. Minneapolis International Electric Co. (1897) 68 Minn. 18, 70 N. W. 796 (the second ground of the decision was the plaintiff's full comprehension of the risk).

A foreman knowing of the existence of a ladder placed upon a roof as a temporary contrivance for a special purpose is a fellow servant with an employee whom he directs to assist in going upon the roof to adjust a collar to a recently erected smokestack. Kiffin v. Wendt (1899) 39 App. Div. 229, 57 N. Y. Supp. 100.

An employer who furnishes a supply of ladders from which employees are to select ladders to be used in painting is not liable for injury to an employee caused by the breaking of the lower of two ladders spliced together by the employees in such a manner that the foot of the ladder had to be placed some distance from the building,—especially where it does not appear that the ladder which broke would have been insufficient if used alone. McKay v. Hand (1897) 168 Mass. 270, 47 N. E. 104.

The result is not changed by the fact that the injured servant had reason to believe that the defective appliance was one of those furnished by the master. Guggenheim Smelting Co. v. Flanagan (1898) 62 N. J. L. 354, 41 Atl. 844, 42 Atl. 145.

It will be observed that the evidence in these cases brings us very close to that which is the subject of consideration in VI. infra. The facts in this class of cases are also susceptible of being sometimes viewed from the standpoint of the plaintiff's contributory negligence, and the master's exemption from liability is sometimes predicated on this ground. Moran v. Brown (1887) 27 Mo. App. 487. See also the extract from the opinion in Durgin v. Munson (1864) 9 Allen, 396, 85 Am. Dec. 770, as quoted in V. m, 1, infra.

I. Giving of signals.

Frequent attempts have been made to bring the negligence of servants deputed to give signals within the scope of the principle that the duty to maintain a safe place of work is non-delegable. But this contention has always been rejected.

An employer is not liable where trainmen cause injury to one of their number by failing to give proper signals to a following train (Hoover v. Beech Creek R. Co. [1893] 154 Pa. 362, 26 Atl. 815; Jenkins v. Richmond & D. R. Co. [1893] 39 S. C. 507, 18 S. E. 182 [first train had broken in two]; Wheatley v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. [1894] 1 Marv. [Del.] 305, 30 Atl. 660); nor where a fireman omitted to sound a bell or whistle for the purpose of notifying the injured employee of the approach of a moving engine (Greenwald v. Marquette, H. & O. R. 54 L. R. A.

[1882] 49 Mich. 197, 13 N. W. 513); nor where one brakeman causes injury to another by giving a signal which causes a sudden reversal of the engine (Cole v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. [1893] 72 Hun, 467, 26 N. Y. Supp. 270); nor where the result of the manner in which a signal was given to a yard hand by his foreman was that he did not understand that the car he was ordered to couple was to be sent to the repair track, and accordingly acted less cautiously than he would have done if he had realized the danger (Fraker v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. [1884] 32 Minn. 54, 19 N. W. 349); nor where a conductor or other official in control of a train injures a brakeman by his negligence in signaling to back up cars. Jackson v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (1897) 43 W. Va. 380, 46 L. R. A. 337, 27 S. E. 278, 31 S. E. 258; McCosker v. Long Island R. Co. (1881) 84 N. Y. 77, Reversing (1880) 21 Hun, 500. In the latter case the court said: "The yardmaster, through whose negligence the injury occurred, must be deemed to have been a fellow servant of the deceased, as to all acts done within the range of the common employment, except such as were done in the performance of some duty which the master owed to his servants. The act, in the present case, was very plainly not of that character. The yardmaster was charged with the duty of making up the trains and distributing the cars in and about the yard, and the repair shops of the defendant, and the deceased was employed by him to assist in that service. As a necessary consequence, broken and disabled cars had to be handled and moved to the repair shops, and whatever of risk was inseparable from their damaged condition, and the inconvenience, and even danger, of getting them to the shops, was an open and palpable risk of his employment, which the deceased assumed. It is, of course, no ground of liability of the company that the bumpers of this car were broken, and it could not be coupled in the ordinary way. The deceased was employed to handle and move to the repair shops damaged and disabled cars, and took the risk of his employment in that respect. While engaged in attaching the broken car to the one in front with the aid of a chain, and by direction of the yardmaster, the latter negligently, and at the wrong moment, signaled to the engineer to back his train, and as a consequence the deceased was crushed between the cars. The negligence which caused the injury was in no sense that of the master. In moving this train the yardmaster was acting, not as the agent of the master in the performance of the master's duties, for it was not the latter's duty to effect the coupling of these cars and their movement to the repair shop. What the yardmaster was doing was the work of a servant, in the department of labor and duty assigned to him as such. No duty which the master owed to his servants was being done by the yard master from the negligent performance of which the injury resulted."

And an employer is not liable where a servant detailed to give warning to the men on board as to the movement of articles which are being hoisted on board a ship omits to perform that duty (Hermann v. Port Blakely Mill Co. [1896] 71 Fed. 358); nor where the plaintiff was injured while assisting in laying iron pipe in a trench, by the pipe swinging against him as it was lowered, in consequence of the negligence of one of plaintiff's fellow servants in giving the signal to lower the pipe (Kennedy v. Allentown Foundry & Mach. Works [1900] 49 App. Div. 78, 63 N. Y. Supp. 195); nor where the proper signals are omitted in navigating ships (The City of Norwalk [1893] 55 Fed. 98; The Queen [1889] 40 Fed. 694).

Where brake-chains are so defective that a brakeman is frequently compelled to go under the car, and while he is there the conductor signals for the train to start, and so injures him, the conductor's negligence, not the broken chains, is regarded as the proximate cause of the injury. Pease v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1884) 61 Wis. 163, 20 N. W. 908.

A conductor of a train, signaling to the engineer to go forward, is a fellow servant of the engineer, and also of the fireman, who was injured by the negligent act of the conductor in making the signal, and of the engineer in obeying it. Grattis v. Kansas City, P. & G. R. Co. (1900) 153 Mo. 380, 48 L. R. A. 399, 55 S. W. 108.

m. Negligence in carrying out the express orders or regulations of the master.

In any case in which the master has issued directions for the guidance of his servants respecting the manner in which the work is to be done, whether those directions take the shape of general rules or of specific orders ad hanc vicem, any delinquencies of which employees may be guilty in regard to the mere details of the work to which those orders or rules relate are deemed to be committed by them as mere servants. In many instances it is easy to deduce the result from the conception that a fellow servant's disobedience to orders is not one of those events which a master is bound to anticipate as likely to make the place of work unsafe. Healey v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1897) 20 R. I. 138, 37 Atl. 676.

Evidence that the master's directions were not followed will, under such circumstances, be viewed as simply negating the existence of negligence on his part. But a comparison of the cases cited below with those reviewed in the preceding subdivisions shows that all the various groups of facts as to which nonliability has been predicated on this ground have been of such a character that the servant would have been unable to recover, quite irrespective of the circumstance that the negligence committed constituted an infraction of the master's orders. Indeed, it is clear, both upon principle and authority, that, so far as the availability of the defense of common employment is concerned, the extent of the master's liability is measured by the same standard, whether the act which caused the injury was or was not forbidden by him. See III. 1, m. supra.

1. Cases of the nonobservance or inadequate observance of general rules.

Where the evidence is equally consistent with the theory that the injury was caused by negligence in supervising the operation of trains, and with the theory that it was caused by the fault of a co-servant, the plaintiff cannot recover. Rose v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1874) 58 N. Y. 217. The court said: "In the case before us it appeared in proof that the train on which the plaintiff's intestate was a brakeman went out within three or four minutes after another train, and was itself followed by a third train, at about the same distance of time. The injury which resulted in the death of the plaintiff's intestate was the consequence, as the jury have found, and as they might rightfully find from the evidence, of those trains being sent out so near together. By what direction they started so nearly at the same time does not appear. All the proof that relates to the point is contained in the single phrase of one of the witnesses, who, speaking, not of the time of the accident, but of the time of his testifying, says: 'The head conductor who has charge of sending out trains is Mr. Rockefeller.' What charge Rockefeller has is not shown, nor whether he, in fact, despatched the trains in question. It does not appear whether he was intrusted with any discretion upon the subject of starting trains, or whether any regulations on the subject, either by a prescribed time-table or otherwise, had been made by the company. But it is obvious that the company may have prescribed proper and safe rules in respect to the starting of these trains, and that those rules may have been disregarded by the persons who actually started these trains so near each other. It may be conceded that it is the duty of a railroad corporation to prescribe, either by means of time-tables or by other suitable modes, regulations for running their trains with a view to their safety; but it is obvious that obedience to these regulations must be intrusted to the employees having charge of the trains. Such obedience is matter of executive detail which, in the nature of things, no corporation or any general agent of a corporation can personally oversee, and as to which employees must be relied upon. . . . Nothing appears in the evidence indicating that any distinction exists between the duty of the company in starting trains and in subsequently running them. In the absence, therefore, of any such proof, and of any proof showing negligence in this respect on the part of the defendants, the case must be determined by ascertaining on which party the burden of proof rests."

The principle that the carrying out of rules is a "matter of detail" was also relied upon in Bryant v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1894) 81 Hun, 164, 30 N. Y. Supp. 737.

When the master has furnished—to be observed by those having the management of his business—such rules as may be reasonably essential to the safety of his employees in any emergency or condition which may be apprehended in the service, he has discharged his duty to them in that respect, and they assume the hazard of the observance of the regulations by those with whom the duty rests to execute them. Tully v. New York & T. S. S. Co. (1896) 10 App. Div. 463, 42 N. Y. Supp. 29. See also Drake v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1894) 80 Hun, 490, 30 N. Y. Supp. 671.

In International & G. N. R. Co. v. Hall (1890) 78 Tex. 657, 15 S. W. 108, the following charge was approved: "If defendant had established or provided such reasonable rules, regulations, etc., plaintiff cannot recover, though he may have been hurt through failure of one or more of his fellow servants to do what was required of him or them under the rules of that business. In other words, if defendant's established methods of management of that branch of its business were reasonably sufficient, had its employees observed and followed them, to have afforded defendant reasonable protection against the danger he incurred when working on the repair track, defendant would not be liable whether its other employees did their duty or not."

In Durgin v. Munson (1864) 9 Allen, 396, 85 Am. Dec. 770, the defect in the engine, which the plaintiff alleged was the cause of his injury, was the insufficiency of the brake to prevent the engine from running off while it was turned on the turn-table. The defendant proposed to show that the person who had charge for him of all the engines on the road had given instructions, before the accident, to the engineers, to have the wheels of their engines "chocked" while turning on the turn-table, and that this accident occurred by failure of some servant of the defendant to obey such instructions. It was held that the exclusion of this evidence was error, as it was not shown that the instruction was given or known to the plaintiff. The court said: "Proof that the accident which caused the injury to the plaintiff was caused by the neglect of a fellow servant would have been a defense to the action; and the offer went to that extent. The defects of the engine in the abstract were not the gist of the plaintiff's complaint, but its defects at the time and for the service in which the defendant allowed it to be used when it ran onto the plaintiff. If it were fit and sufficient for use in the manner in which the defendant then allowed it to be used, its insufficiency for other service, at other times, would not concern the plaintiff. Now it is plain that a machine may be safe and fit for one use, when it is not for another. To put an extreme case, by way of illustration: Suppose the defendant had a worn-out engine, unfit for any service, and he had given orders that it should not be run at all; yet some workman had, without his knowledge, undertaken to run it; could the master be held responsible to the fellow servant? Suppose a car that was not fit to run with steam power was kept for use only when drawn by horses; or an engine which had not the proper appliances for a locomotive was employed solely as a stationary engine; would an unauthorized change of the use make the master liable? If this engine, when 'choked' upon the turn-table, was absolutely safe against the possibility of running off, so that it needed no brake at all in that position, and it was not permitted to be turned until the blocking was applied to the wheels, it would be a question for the jury whether the want of a brake was the cause of the injury. There is no absolute requirement of law that the injurious action of a locomotive engine shall be prevented by the specific expedient of a brake. If other sufficient means of safety, equivalent in effect, were supplied, that is all that is necessary; and the jury were to judge of their sufficiency. The fact that the orders to the engineers were not known to the plaintiff would not be decisive, because the question on that part of the case was, whether the engineers were careless, and by their failure to obey instructions the accident occurred. The evidence which was rejected should therefore have been received, as having a direct tendency to show whether the defendant used such precautions and gave such rules for the use of the engine in the condition in which it was at the time of the accident, as made it then a proper instrument for the service to which it was to be applied."

Where all the testimony shows that a special order to an engineer to run his train "two hours late" was to be read in connection with the general rules of the company, and was so understood by all the employees concerned, and that such order meant that the train was to run with reference to the schedule of all passenger trains, and never to encroach upon the time of the train which it followed, the company cannot be held liable for injuries which a brakeman on the train in front received through the negligence of the engineer of the following train in running it too fast. Kennelty v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1895) 186 Pa. 60, 30 Atl. 1014.

Where a railroad company has employed a sufficient number of competent servants to shift its cars in a yard, and has promulgated proper rules for the management of the business, it is not liable for the consequences of a brakeman's failing to take his proper position on the top of moving cars. Potter v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1892) 136 N. Y. 77, 32 N. E. 603, Distinguishing Filke v. Boston & A. B. Co. (1873) 53 N. Y. 549, 13 Am. Rep. 545.

In Wright v. New York C. R. Co. (1862) 25 N. Y. 568, it was sought to support the judgment on the ground of the improper arrangement of the time-tables at the point where the collision took place. The court, however, held that the time-tables were not in fault, but that the collision grew out of the carelessness of the employees in running the train not in conformity with the time-tables, and that the fault was therefore to be regarded as that of a fellow servant, and that the defendants were not responsible.

An employer is not liable for the death of an employee killed by the fall of a cornice which he was engaged in putting up without anchors, where he voluntarily assumed the risk, and the foreman in charge of the work had no authority to go on with it except in accordance with the plans and specifications, which provided for the use of anchors. Homersky v. Winkle Terra Cotta Co. (1899) 178 Ill. 562, 53 N. E. 346, Affirming (1898) 77 Ill. App. 42.

The duty of a railroad company to provide its employees a reasonably safe place to work does not render it liable for injuries received by a brakeman in a collision between his train and an engine, resulting from the negligent disregard by the engineer of such engine of his orders to proceed on a track other than that on which the train was running. Healey v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1897) 20 R. I. 136, 37 Atl. 676.

Even if it be assumed that rules for signals at crossings and as to speed are available to an employee, the negligence of the conductor and engineer of a train in failing to make such signals, and in running at excessive speed, is that of fellow servants as regards a section hand. Wright v. Southern R. Co. (1897) 50 Fed. 260.

The defendant is not entitled to a nonsuit where the evidence leaves it uncertain whether the injury was caused by the misconduct of the plaintiff's co-servants in violating a duly promulgated rule, or whether at the time the injury was received they were acting without any regulations, and simply following a dangerous practice sanctioned by time and custom. Doing v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. (1897) 151 N. Y. 579, 45 N. E. 1028.

A railroad company is not liable for the death of a brakeman in a collision, on the ground that the train dispatcher should have warned the conductor of the following train of the preceding one, where a despatch had been forwarded to the side-tracking station in ample time to afford an opportunity to side-track the first train but for its delay in reaching the station, and the conductor had been warned to guard against the following train, and knew of the increased danger, and took no precautions to guard against it. Herrington v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1894) 83 Hun, 865, 31 N. Y. Supp. 910.

The plaintiff's action was also held not to be maintainable on this ground in the following cases: Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Henderson (1882) 37 Ohio St. 549 (trainmen injured through collision resulting from the negligence of an employee sent to flag an approaching train); Niles v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1897) 14 App. Div. 58, 43 N. Y. Supp. 751 (engineer ran his train past a block signal so that it came into collision with another standing on the track); Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Tohill (1895) 143 Ind. 49, 41 N. E. 709, Rehearing denied in 143 Ind. 60, 42 N. E. 352 (collision caused by conductor's running train past station, instead of side-tracking, as required by the regulations); Simpson v. Central Vermont R. Co. (1896) 5 App. Div. 614, 39 N. Y. Supp. 464 (same species of accident); Northern P. R. Co. v. Polrier (1897) 167 U. S. 48, 42 L. ed. 72, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 741 (collision caused by conductor's disregard of rule as to running a train closely behind another); Ford v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1889) 117 N. Y. 638, 22

N. E. 946 (disregard by employees of rules regulating the loading of cars); Byrnes v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1889) 113 N. Y. 251, 4 L. R. A. 151, 21 N. E. 50 (railroad company not liable for the negligence of its employees in making inspection of loaded cars which is imposed on them by its rules); Rutledge v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1894) 123 Mo. 121, 24 S. W. 1053, 27 S. W. 327 (brakeman thrown off car by a sudden check in its movements consequent upon a fellow servant's giving a signal to the engineer in breach of the custom in use); Denver & B. G. R. Co. v. Sipes (1896) 23 Colo. 226, 47 Pac. 287 (railroad company not liable for the consequences of a conductor's negligence in failing to observe a rule of the company with respect to the closing of switches); Davis v. Staten Island Rapid Transit R. Co. (1896) 1 App. Div. 178, 37 N. Y. Supp. 157 (switch left open by conductor—brakeman injured); Moeller v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1897) 13 App. Div. 467, 43 N. Y. Supp. 603 (car repairer injured by fellow servant's failure to put out a signal flag); Enright v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. (1892) 93 Mich. 409, 53 N. W. 536 (engineer disregarded rule requiring freight trains to approach stations under full control); Peterson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1887) 67 Mich. 102, 34 N. W. 260 (no signal flag placed, as required by rules to protect car repairers); Renfro v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1885) 86 Mo. 302 (breach of rules made for the protection of car repairers); Duthie v. Caledonian R. Co. (1898) 25 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 954 (breach of rule requiring foremen of track-repairing gangs to set a lookout); Whalen v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1897) 114 Mich. 512, 72 N. W. 323 (brakeman or conductor failed to pull automatic cord when brakes were whistled for); Lunquist v. Duluth Street R. Co. (1896) 65 Minn. 387, 67 N. W. 1006* (warning signal not given, as prescribed by rules); McDonald v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1892) 63 Hun, 537, 18 N. Y. Supp. 609 (engineer's breach of rule requiring him to examine engine); Henry v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1882) 49 Mich. 495, 13 N. W. 832 (rules requiring engineer to obey certain signals were violated by an engineer); Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Leeper (1895) 60 Ill. App. 194 (signals at switch disregarded); Miller v. Southern I. Co. (1891) 20 Or. 285, 26 Pac. 70 (breach of rule as to adjustment of switches); Cooper v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. (1898) 25 App. Div. 383, 49 N. Y. Supp. 481 (freight cars left on a siding without setting brake).

2. Cases of negligence in carrying out specific orders.

A railway company is not liable for an injury due to the neglect of orders properly communicated by the employer's representative as to the running of trains. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Smith (1890) 76 Tex. 611, 18 S. W. 562; Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Doyle (1893) 60 Miss. 977 (where a conductor went on past a station without getting instructions, as the train despatcher had directed, with regard to the future movements of the train).

A railway company is not liable for injuries due to the negligence of an engineer, who, against orders, moved a train out of a siding, and thus caused it to collide with another owing to its being provided with a defective headlight. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Perrigney (1891) 138 Ind. 414, 31 N. E. 233, 37 N. E. 976.

Where the road superintendent of a railway company disobeys the manager's order not to take a train across a defective bridge the case should go to the jury on the question whether such an order was given. Carney v. Carraquet R. Co. (1890) 29 N. H. 425.

of the accident was the sudden opening of a trap door in a passage, from below, by a co-servant of the plaintiff in disobedience to express orders of a foreman, the result being that the plaintiff fell through the opening. Anthony v. Leeret (1887) 106 N. Y. 591, 12 N. E. 561.

The failure of a brakeman on a train to stop the same when he sees a fellow servant upon a railroad bridge in what will be a dangerous position if the train proceeds, by reason of which such fellow servant is injured, will not render the company liable, although he is directed by the superintendent to move the train across the bridge. Austin & N. W. R. Co. v. Beatty (1894) 6 Tex. Civ. App. 650, 24 S. W. 934.

An employer's order to lower a beam during the construction of a bridge does not render him liable for the act of an employee charged with the execution of the order, in lowering the beam so carelessly as to inflict an injury on a fellow servant. Ryan v. McCully (1894) 128 Mo. 636, 27 S. W. 533.

n. Failure to give instruction.

Where a servant has notice of the general risks and dangers of his employment, as, for example, that many of the cars which he is required to handle as a switchman are defective, the master is not guilty of negligence in failing to notify him of each particular defect, as such duty, if required, is one necessarily devolving on fellow servants, for whose particular acts of negligence the master is not responsible. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Hennessey (1899) 38 C. C. A. 307, 96 Fed. 713.

Evidence that an employer referred a servant to an experienced fellow employee for information as to the proper manner of dealing with a misspent charge of dynamite, and that, in consequence of following the instruction given, the servant was killed, is insufficient to support a charge of negligence on the employer's part. Welch v. Grace (1897) 167 Mass. 590, 46 N. E. 387.

o. Negligence in manipulation of the instrumentalities during the progress of the work.

Below are tabulated under headings calculated to facilitate comparison with III. c, d, supra, a number of cases illustrating the non-liability of the master for negligence in handling the instrumentalities, under various circumstances, during the actual progress of the work. See also V. f, i, supra.

1. Handling railway cars and locomotives.

A railroad company may, subject to its duty to provide proper rules, commit the handling of its trains and cars upon its road and in its yards to its employees, so as to avoid liability to employees from negligence in the handling of the same. Sanner v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1897) 17 Tex. Civ. App. 337, 43 S. W. 533.

Such a company, therefore, cannot be held liable for an injury to a laborer on a construction train, where the plaintiff seeks to recover on the theory that a special duty was incumbent on the engineer in charge to see that the cars were safely coupled before starting. Ryan v. Cleveland Valley R. Co. (1854) 23 Pa. 384.

The hand cannot recover for injuries caused by the act of the ordinary servants of the company in making up a train of cars with platforms of unequal height, under the direction of the station master. Hodgkins v. Eastern R. Co. (1876) 119 Mass. 419.

Negligence in making up a train was treated as a breach of a nondelegable duty in Norfolk

& W. R. Co. v. Nuckols (1895) 91 Va. 195, 21 S. E. 342, explaining, on this theory, Moon v. Richmond & A. B. Co. (1884) 78 Va. 745, 49 Am. Rep. 401.

Nor can a trainhand recover for injuries caused by a coservant's neglect to observe the usual custom of chaining up a defective draw-head on a car. Arnold v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1890) 125 N. Y. 15, 25 N. E. 1084.

No action can be maintained where a collision is caused by the recklessness of an engineer (Wright v. New York C. R. Co. [1862] 25 N. Y. 562); nor where a train is run at excessive speed, and so derailed (Stetler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. [1879] 46 Wis. 497, 1 N. W. 112; Sherman v. Rochester & S. R. Co. [1853] 15 Barb. 574); nor where an engineer runs his engine against a brakeman (Fowler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. [1884] 61 Wis. 159, 21 N. W. 40); nor where a conductor of a work train runs it without a light and injures a trackman (Coon v. Syracuse & U. R. Co. [1851] 5 N. Y. 492); nor where an engineer disregards the signals at a switch, and so runs his train on to a siding (Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Leeper [1895] 60 Ill. App. 194); nor where an engineer caused the death of a fireman by his failure to notice a red light at a switch. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hosler (1892) 45 Ill. App. 205.

In Howard v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. (1886) 26 Fed. 837, the court rejected the contention that, because the locomotive operated by the delinquent was in the way, and collided with decedent's train, the track was not clear, and therefore the master had failed in his duty of providing a safe place for the employee to work in and upon. See IV. a, supra.

A general charge in favor of defendant in an action by a brakeman against a railroad company for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by a defective appliance for controlling the motion of the engine should be given where the only defect was in the brake of the engine, and the shock causing the injuries was caused by putting the engine in motion, and there is no evidence that the defective brake contributed to causing the injuries. Highland Ave. & B. R. Co. v. Miller (1898) 120 Ala. 535, 24 So. 955.

A brakeman on a train ordered to run ahead of another train under circumstances requiring the employees in control to look out for such train and keep out of its way cannot recover for a collision caused by the failure of the conductor and engineer of his train to sidetrack the other train. Hoover v. Beech Creek R. Co. (1893) 154 Pa. 362, 26 Atl. 315.

Leaving cars standing on side tracks on each side of the main track in a switch yard, in such close proximity as to obstruct the view of a wagon road crossing the tracks at right angles, in consequence of which a foreman of a gang of men in the yard, whose business it was to locate the stored cars and see that the wagon way was left open, was killed by a collision between an engine on which he was riding and a loaded wagon, is negligence,—either his own contributory negligence or the negligence of his fellow servants. Hebert v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1891) 41 N. Y. S. R. 860, 16 N. Y. Supp. 561.

An engineer cannot recover where he is injured through running his train against some box cars left standing on the main track owing to the negligence of the station agent. Brown v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1884) 31 Minn. 553, 18 N. W. 834.

Though an engineer may be charged with the duty of instructing an engine wiper when the latter's foreman is absent, the former does not stand in the relation of vice principal to the latter in regard to his work of shifting and making up trains. South Florida R. Co. v. Weese (1893) 32 Fla. 212, 13 So. 436.

A railway company is not liable for the death of a brakeman, who, after a train had separated owing to a defect in the couplings of one of the rear cars, had undertaken to repair the defect, and was killed by the negligence of the engineer in backing up the cars in the forward part of the train. Course v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1888) 17 N. Y. S. R. 715, 2 N. Y. Supp. 312. Affirmed in (1889) 117 N. Y. 652, 22 N. E. 1133.

The retention of a car of another road in the yards of a railroad company after it has been ordered to be returned as defective, by the yardmaster or crews in the yard, is the act of a fellow servant of a switchman injured while attempting to couple such car to another for the purpose of removing it from the yard. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Meyers (1896) 22 C. C. A. 268, 46 U. S. App. 226, 76 Fed. 443, previous appeal (1894) 11 C. C. A. 439, 24 U. S. App. 295, 63 Fed. 793. The court said: "The only vice principal or representative of the railroad company in the occurrences of the day was the inspector, and he represented the company only in the inspection of the car, and in the giving of notice of defects. The company owed to the defendant in error no duty in respect to the time or manner of return. If the car had been retained in the Santa Fé yards by the order or authority of a general superintendent or other general officer of the company, and the plaintiff, being required to work about it, had suffered injury by reason of its defective condition, he would doubtless have had cause for complaint; but the crews engaged in the yards at Streator, including yard master, foremen, and engineers, were all his fellow servants, and for what they did with the car after the inspection, and after notice that it was to be returned to the other road, the plaintiff in error is not amenable."

A street-railway employee injured in a collision with an empty car which ran down an incline because the brake was not properly set by a fellow servant cannot recover therefor. Hoover v. Carbon County Electric R. Co. (1899) 191 Pa. 146, 43 Atl. 74.

2. Operating hand cars.

The negligent operation of a hand car by a section foreman is not a delinquency imputable to the company. Martin v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1897) 166 U. S. 399, 41 L. ed. 1051, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 608 (see as to this case under V. f, supra); Northern P. R. Co. v. Charles (1896) 162 U. S. 359, 40 L. ed. 999, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 848 (excessive speed); Olson v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1888) 38 Minn. 117, 35 N. W. 866 (foreman took no precaution to secure his hand car against a collision); Justice v. Pennsylvania Co. (1892) 130 Ind. 321, 30 N. E. 303 (workman struck by lever of hand car).

3. Improperly placing the loads on railway cars and other vehicles.

That a railway company is not liable for injuries due to the improper manner in which railway cars are loaded has been held in Conger v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. (1891) 86 Mich. 76, 48 N. W. 695 (carelessly placed side stake allowed log to fall so that train was derailed); Lellis v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1900) 124 Mich. 37, — L. R. A. —, 82 N. W. 828; Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Johnson (1885) 102 Ind. 352, 26 N. E. 200; Fitzgerald v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1892) 156 Mass. 293, 31 N. E. 7 (bales of hay carelessly stowed); Sweeney v. Page (1892) 64 Hun. 172, 18 N. Y. Supp. 890 (car jolted, throwing a heavy stone forward, the re-suit being that the plaintiff was pushed off); Bailey v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1898) 27 App. Div. 305, 50 N. Y. Supp. 87 (loaded car, as a whole, not an appliance, as the trial judge laid down in his charge—projecting timber). In the last-cited case the court said: "It is the clear duty of the master to at all times furnish the servant safe material with which to do the work required, so far as the exercise of reasonable care in selection and inspection can make them so. But the use of such material is necessarily the work of the servant. Whoever accepts service under the master does so with the knowledge that it is the servant, and not the master, who will cause any injury that may result from a careless use of the material so furnished. And so far as protection against such careless use is concerned, he can, in reason, expect no more from the master than that competent coemployees be employed, and a judicious system be adopted for carrying out the work. The car is furnished for the express purpose of being loaded and run over the road, and the brakeman is one of the employees, and the man who loads and inspects the loading is another whose duty it is to carry out that purpose. Each uses, within his own sphere, the car furnished by the master, and both are engaged in carrying out the purpose for which it is furnished. Surely the loading of the car was not an act 'pertaining to the duty the master owes to his servants' any more than running it over the road was such an act; and, hence, within long-settled rules, the master is not liable for negligence in loading it."

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Seeley (1894) 54 Kan. 21, 37 Pac. 104, the court declined to follow Dewey v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. (1893) 97 Mich. 329, 22 L. R. A. 292, 56 N. W. 756 (see VII. b, 6, infra), and held the company liable for improper loading. See III. d, 11, supra.

A similar principle is applicable with regard to the loading of other kinds of vehicles. Thus, it is held that the supervision of the loading of an elevator is a mere detail of the work. Deneefeld v. Baumann (1899) 40 App. Div. 502, 58 N. Y. Supp. 110.

So, a proprietor of iron works is not liable for an injury to an employee, caused by the negligent manner in which coemployees loaded iron upon an iron wagon or buggy. Bemisch v. Roberts (1891) 143 Pa. 1, 21 Atl. 998.

So, an employer is not liable for injuries to an employee through the capsizing of a car having a superstructure for handling timbers not dangerous if properly used, due to the overloading of such car by coemployees. Callaway v. Allen (1894) 12 C. C. A. 114, 24 U. S. App. 363, 64 Fed. 297. The court said: "The primary cause of the accident was the careless and negligent use of the car by Anderson and the men under him. The weight of evidence is clear that the car, with the added superstructure, was not ordinarily or necessarily dangerous, if carefully handled and not overloaded. . . . The evidence shows clearly that the car was overloaded. The timbers were too heavy for the counterbalancing weight, and that was the fault of coemployees, and was the primary and controlling cause of the accident."

Cases involving injuries from the improper loading of cars often turn upon the question whether the servant assumed the risk as one of those ordinarily incident to the service. With these we are not concerned in this note. In other cases the liability of a railroad company for injuries caused by foreign cars so loaded that the freight upon them projects over the ends has been referred to the consideration whether it is negligence to receive into a train cars loaded in this manner. In one case the ground has been taken that its acceptance is merely a fact bearing upon the question of the company's negligence. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gower (1887) 85 Tenn. 473, 3 S. W. 824. In another it has been held that the court may pronounce the company, as a matter of law, not to be guilty of negligence in exposing a servant to a risk of this character. Northern C. R. Co. v. Hussion (1882) 101 Pa. 1, 47 Am. Rep. 690; Day v. Toledo, C. S. & D. R. Co. (1880) 42 Mich. 523, 4 N. W. 203.

But this theory of the circumstances involved in cases of this class suggests a standpoint different from that occupied in the cases in which the responsibility of the master has been discussed with special reference to the existence of a duty to ascertain the condition of the cars which the servants are required to handle, and the right to maintain an action is tested by an examination of the question whether that duty is assignable or absolute. This question can only be material when it has been determined that there has been a breach of duty. See III. q, supra.

In a later subdivision it will be shown that the negligence of an employee in inspecting a railway car with a view to ascertaining whether it is properly loaded is that of a mere coemployee of the trainmen: See VII. b, 6, infra.

A master is not liable, where his foreman in helping to unload lumber from a wagon allowed a roller to fall off upon a servant. Lundberg v. Shevlin-Carpenter Co. (1897) 68 Minn. 135, 70 N. W. 1078.

4. Unloading railway cars or other vehicles.

Compare the cases cited V. o, 7, infra.

A conductor of a freight train acts as a mere servant in helping a brakeman to unload a car. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Southwick (1896) 16 Ind. App. 486, 44 N. E. 263.

5. Manipulating switches.

The duty of opening and closing a switch in the ordinary operation of a railroad is not one of the personal duties of the master, but a duty of operation. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Needham (1894) 25 L. R. A. 833, 11 C. C. A. 56, 27 U. S. App. 227, 63 Fed. 107. The court said: "The roadbed, ties, tracks, stations, rolling stock, and all the appurtenances of a well-equipped railroad together constitute a great machine for transportation. It is the duty of the railroad company to use ordinary care to furnish a sound and reasonably safe machine, to use due diligence to keep it in proper repair, and to use ordinary care to employ reasonably competent servants to operate it; but, when this duty is performed, the duty rests upon the servants to operate it carefully. In the case before us there is no evidence that the conductor who negligently left the switch open was not selected with reasonable care. There is no claim that there was any defect in the switch that hindered or prevented the conductor from closing it. The company furnished a switch sufficient to move the rails, and used due care in selecting the servant to operate it. Before this servant commenced to operate it, the switch was closed, so that the passenger train on which the decedent was killed might have passed in safety. It became the duty of the conductor, in the operation of the railroad, to open this switch and to run his train through it upon the spur track. He did so. It then became his duty to take his train off the spur track, and to close the switch. He took his train off, and proceeded south, but carelessly left the switch open. His negligence was not in the construction, preparation, or repair of the railroad, but in its operation. The railroad was safe before he made it unsafe by his negligence in operating it, and he was discharging none of the personal duties of the master, but one of the duties of the servant, when he became guilty of the fatal negligence. Any other holding would annihilate the now settled rule of liability for the negligence of fellow servants. It will not do to say that the timely movement and fastening of a switch in the ordinary operation of a railroad is requisite to provide a safe place for the next train to be operated in, and hence is one of the personal duties of the master. Under such a rule, it would become the absolute duty of the master to so operate all switches, all turntables, the levers of all engines, all brakes, all cars, and every appurtenance of the railroad that every place upon it should at all times be safe, and no negligence of any employee could ever cause an injury to another servant for which the master might not be held liable. At the instant of the injury, every place in which an injury is inflicted is unsafe. The test of liability is not the safety of the place nor of the machinery at the instant of injury, but the character of the duty, the negligent performance of which caused the injury. Was it a duty of construction, preparation, or repair, or was it a duty of operation of the machine? To the same effect, see Pleasants v. Raleigh & A. Air Line R. Co. (1897) 121 N. C. 492, 28 S. E. 267; Daves v. Southern P. Co. (1893) 98 Cal. 19, 32 Pac. 708 (train ran through the switch on to the siding and killed a track repairer); Corcoran v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1891) 126 N. Y. 673, 27 N. E. 1022 (car allowed to run on to repair track).

The proximate cause of the injury is the negligence of a fellow servant where a collision of a switch engine with a train was caused by negligence of the brakeman in manipulating the switch, and the water tank of the engine, insufficiently secured to withstand the shock of the collision, was thereby thrown forward onto a brakeman riding on the engine. Vizelich v. Southern P. Co. (1899) 126 Cal. 587, 59 Pac. 129; Guthrie v. Southern P. R. Co. (1891; Or.) 26 Pac. 76.

In Miller v. Southern P. Co. (1891) 20 Or. 285, 26 Pac. 70, the special contention was put forward that the effect of a general rule of the company providing that conductors would be held personally responsible for the proper adjustment of switches used by their trains was to create the conductor whose negligence caused the injury vice principal as regards the plaintiff. The court rejected this contention, reasoning thus: "The argument for the plaintiff proceeds upon the assumption that the switch was broken and disarranged when the Lebanon locomotive used it, and that Huston [the conductor] had devolved upon him the duty of seeing that the switch was properly adjusted, which being a personal duty the company owed to Miller, that the negligence of Huston in failing to discover that the switch was out of order was the negligence of the company, and rendered it liable for the injurious consequences which ensued. The rule was a proper and needful regulation, and disobedience to it was well calculated to insure safety, but it was not designed to create any new or distinct liability other than the law established. As a rule, it did not operate to change the rule of law which governed the relation of the parties and fixed their liabilities. The conductors were not expected to perform the duties of switchmen—someone under them, usually a brakeman, discharged this duty, by their direction; and the object of the rule in making them responsible was to secure the best possible performance of the duty of a switchman to insure safety in operating the trains. It added no new or other element to the legal relation of the parties concerned than already existed. The whole duty combined and to be performed in this regard, by conductor and switchman, in operating the switch, only constituted the proper discharge of the duty of a switchman. It is not the duty of a master, 'as with a personal sight and touch,' to operate the switches on the road. . . . If we take the character of the act performed by such servant to determine whether he is an agent or representative of the company, or a fellow servant, what is there in the act of operating a switch so as to properly adjust the rails for the passage of trains which may be considered in any sense to impose or delegate the duty to such employee to furnish, construct, keep or maintain in repair such switch? However liberally we may construe the rule as to co-servants, it is difficult to perceive, if the rule itself is to remain, that a servant engaged in the operation of a switch is a representative of the master or other than a fellow servant engaged in a common employment for the successful management of the trains. The act he performs involves no duty of construction or repair, or other duty in regard to the switches of the road if out of repair or unfit for use, whether by wear and tear or by the criminal interference of strangers, than to promptly notify the company of its condition so that it may be repaired or its place supplied."

6. Failing to prevent the movement of heavy pieces of machinery.

The negligence of a servant in failing to secure railway cars on an incline so far as to prevent their moving is not chargeable to the company. Kudik v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. (1894) 78 Hun, 492, 29 N. Y. Supp. 533.

A train hand cannot recover for the negligence of a co-servant in failing to block the wheel of a railway car so as to prevent its moving. Dodge v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1892) 155 Mass. 448, 29 N. E. 1086.

An averment which shows that the proximate cause of the injury was the moving of a traveling crane shows that it was due to the act of a fellow servant, and no recovery can be had on the theory that another crane was defective. Raxter v. Abernethy (1893) 21 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 159.

A servant who was injured while working in the elevator of a mine which he had been ordered to clean cannot recover where the cause of the injury was the starting of the engine which operated the hoisting machinery, and the accident might have been prevented if the foreman had, as it was his duty to do, detached the endless chains used in running the elevator, and thus disconnected it from the machinery. New Pittsburgh Coal & Coke Co. v. Peterson (1894) 136 Ind. 398, 35 N. E. 7 (1896) 14 Ind. App. 634, 43 N. E. 270.

7. Operating hoisting machinery.

An employer is not liable for injuries to a workman handling the crank of a crane hoisting a heavy weight by the slipping of the shaft from slow gear into fast gear requiring much greater power, through fellow workmen stationing themselves upon the side of the crank opposite to the fast gear, and the pressure caused by their position. Barlow v. Standard Steel Casting Co. (1893) 154 Pa. 180, 26 Atl. 12.

The absence of a clutch to a machine does not render an employer liable for an injury to an employee while entangled in a rope, where the injury would have been prevented if the employee had held the rope tightly, or if a fellow employee at the machine had done the same thing, and there is no reason to believe that he would have been more liable to use the clutch, if there had been one. American Glucose Co. v. Lavin (1898) 81 Ill. App. 482.

The death of an employee caused by the failure, either of himself or a coemployee, to take the twist out of a chain on a windlass used in operating machinery, will not render the employer liable. DeLaney v. Heartt (1890) 32 N. Y. S. R. 499, 10 N. Y. Supp. 595.

Plaintiff's intestate was employed by defendants, at the time of his death, at the bottom of a mine shaft, his duty being to fill the ore bucket, which was hoisted by a horse led by a boy. The employee at the top of the shaft, whose duty it was to dump the ore bucket and let it down to deceased, dropped it without looking to see whether the boy had hooked the rope to the hame of the horse, as was the custom, in order to let the bucket down steadily, which he had not done; and the bucket struck deceased and killed him. It was held that, though the boy was incompetent to manage the horse, such incompetency was not the cause of the accident, but that it was caused by the negligence of deceased's fellow servant at the top of the shaft, and hence there was no error in directing a verdict for defendants. Adams v. Snow (1900) 106 Wis. 152, 81 N. W. 988.

An employer is not liable for the negligent operation of an elevator, which is safe if carefully used. White v. Eldilts (1897) 19 App. Div. 258, 46 N. Y. Supp. 184; Trewatha v. Buchanan Gold Min. & Mill. Co. (1892) 96 Cal. 494, 28 Pac. 571, 81 Pac. 561.

The servant's action is not maintainable where upon the evidence the cause of the injury must have been the negligence of one fellow servant in leaving an elevator suspended at the floor from which it fell when another fellow servant got onto it, or in leaving the rope out of gear, or in descending on it while the rope was out of gear. Kelley v. Boston Lead Co. (1880) 128 Mass. 456.

The mate of a vessel is a fellow servant of a boatswain in managing the chain in lowering the topmast, which the boatswain has gone up to unfasten. The Miami (1898) 87 Fed. 757.

An employer is not liable for injury to an employee in the hold of a vessel by the overturning of a loaded bucket which hit the coamings of the hatch, where, on reaching the coamings, it was pulled sidewise by another employee, to be dumped on the dock, and there is no other showing of negligence. McDonough v. Walsh (1892) 49 N. Y. S. R. 361, 21 N. Y. Supp. 308.

A foreman of a stevedore gang acts as a fellow servant of a stevedore at work in the hold of a vessel, in stopping a draft of loaded bags as it comes over the vessel's side, to have them made tighter in the sling before being lowered into the hatch, and the ship is not liable for injuries caused by their being left unsecured, and falling and injuring the workmen below. The Kensington (1898) 91 Fed. 681.

Recovery cannot be had for the death of an employee on a steamship, caused by the falling of a barrel from a sling while being lowered into the hold, where the negligence, if any, causing its fall, was that of a fellow servant. Moy v. Ocean S. S. Co. (1895) 12 Misc. 375, 33 N. Y. Supp. 663.

The captain of a lighter engaged in delivering boards upon a vessel cannot recover for injuries from the fall of boards caused by the insecure manner of fastening the rope holding them while being hoisted, where the fault was that of one of the workmen. The Ravensdale (1894) 63 Fed. 624.

A ship is not liable for injuries to a longshoreman engaged in the hold helping to unload iron, caused by the fall of iron from a skid 54 L. R. A.

through the corner of which a lanyard pulled out, when the skid caught through the negligence of the guy-tender or engineer as it was coming up. The Servia (1891) 44 Fed. 948.

8. Operating machinery in sawmills.

Plaintiff was thrown onto a trimming saw which he was operating in defendant's sawmill, and was injured, having been struck by one end of a plank lying on rolls, the other end of which had been caught on the carriage of the main saw. It was the duty of a fellow servant to see that the plank was so placed on the rolls that it could not be caught by the carriage, and of another fellow servant not to run the carriage unless it was clear of the planks on the rolls. It was held that the injury was caused by the negligence of one or both of the fellow servants. Demers v. Deering (1899) 93 Me. 272, 44 Atl. 922.

9. Operating a fire hose.

The failure of water to run from a hose will, in the absence of positive evidence, be attributed to the negligence of fellow servants in failing to keep the apparatus in proper order, or in negligently putting it in operation. Jones v. Granite Mills (1878) 126 Mass. 84, 80 Am. Rep. 661.

10. Starting machinery without warning.

In several cases the principle is applied that there can be no recovery where the injury was caused by the negligence of a co-servant in starting machinery without notice, at a time when the plaintiff is in such a position that he is safe as long as it is not in motion. Bergstrom v. Staples (1890) 82 Mich. 654, 46 N. W. 1035; Fournier v. Columbian Mfg. Co. (1890) N. H. 44 Atl. 104; O'Brien v. American Dredging Co. (1891) 53 N. J. L. 291, 21 Atl. 324; Henshaw v. Pond's Extract Co. (1892) 50 N. Y. S. R. 263, 21 N. Y. Supp. 177 (oilier injured); Whitley v. Block (1894) 95 Ga. 15, 21 S. E. 985 (elevator); Porter v. Silver Creek & M. Coal Co. (1893) 84 Wis. 418, 54 N. W. 1019 (sudden starting of machinery tautened a slack cable); Wilson v. Hudson River Water Power & Paper Co. (1893) 71 Hun. 292, 24 N. Y. Supp. 1072 (water turned on to a power wheel); Davis v. Muscogee Mfg. Co. (1898) 106 Ga. 126, 32 S. E. 30; Kerr v. Crown Cotton Mills (1898) 105 Ga. 510, 31 S. E. 166 (petition alleging that steam was turned on from an engine so negligently by the engineer, or some other employee of the defendant, that the plaintiff, who was washing a window, was injured, shows no cause of action).

11. Moving heavy articles.

See also V. b, h, i, o, 8, supra.

A railway company is not liable where injury was received by a section hand owing to the way in which his collaborators lifted a rail. Coyne v. Union P. R. Co. (1890) 133 U. S. 370, 33 L. ed. 651, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 382.

An employer is not liable for the negligent manner in which a foreman conducts the operation of moving a heavy wheel. Richmond Locomotive & Mach. Co. v. Ford (1897) 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. 509.

A lumber company is not liable for an injury to a lumberman, caused by the negligence of co-employees in failing to keep rollers at right angles with a piece of timber being moved thereon, in consequence of which it slewed around so that the end struck a lumber pile, from which planks fell on his leg. Weeklund v. Southern Oregon Co. (1891) 20 Or. 591, 27 Pac. 260 (carelessness of workmen in using chute, not negligence in its construction, declared to be the proximate cause of the injury).

There can be no recovery for an accident caused by the slacking of guy ropes in the hands of the plaintiff's fellow servants, while a heavy piece of a bridge was being moved. Ludlow v. Groton Bridge & Mfg. Co. (1896) 11 App. Div. 452, 42 N. Y. Supp. 343.

A servant has no cause of action against his master for an injury received while assisting to handle a heavy stone, through the neglect of his fellow workmen in letting the stone down too soon. La Belle v. Montague (1899) 174 Mass. 453, 54 N. E. 859.

12. Causing or allowing heavy objects to fall.

An employer is not liable for injuries caused to one servant by the carelessness of another in pulling away a choking guard in a pile driver, and thus allowing the hammer to fall. McPhee v. Scully (1895) 163 Mass. 216, 39 N. E. 1007.

A bridge foreman is a fellow servant of a carpenter in negligently and carelessly permitting a jackscrew to fall, which was set up by the two, and which the foreman agreed to watch. Peirce v. Oliver (1897) 18 Ind. App. 87, 47 N. E. 485.

A master is not liable for the death of a servant caused by the fall of a sliding door in a store, where it fell owing to the careless manner in which it was opened by the men in charge of it. Collyer v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1886) 49 N. J. L. 59, 6 Atl. 437.

A laborer cannot recover where he is struck by a plank left loose on a scaffold by his foreman, and thrown off by a tank which is being hoisted through a window by himself and his co-servants. Bagley v. Consolidated Gas Co. (1896) 5 App. Div. 432, 39 N. Y. Supp. 802.

A superintendent, in answering in the affirmative when a laborer was about to throw down a block of wood and asked if all was clear below, acted as a mere servant. Donnelly v. San Francisco Bridge Co. (1897) 117 Cal. 417, 49 Pac. 559.

The negligence of a foreman in dropping an implement and injuring an employee under his direction is that of a fellow servant, and not of a vice principal. Frawley v. Sheldon (1897) 20 R. I. 258, 38 Atl. 370.

A mining company is not liable where a miner is injured by the negligence of a blacksmith, whose duty it is to sharpen the tools, in lowering them down a shaft. Snyder v. Viola Min. & Smelting Co. (1891) 2 Idaho, 771, 28 Pac. 127.

A foreman in a machine shop is a fellow servant, with respect to his own negligence in the manner of bracing a section of a heavy condenser, of an employee who assisted him and was injured by the section falling upon him. Killegel v. Welsel & V. Mfg. Co. (1893) 84 Wis. 148, 53 N. W. 1119.

An injury caused by the fall of the door of a freight house, struck by a keg of nails which was being rolled out by the plaintiff's co-servants, is regarded as being due to the negligence of the latter, and not to the negligence of the company, where the evidence shows that the door, when rolled back, left a space of about 8 feet for the unloading of freight, amply sufficient for the passage of the keg if it had been handled with reasonable care. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Becker (1890) 38 Ill. App. 523.

An employee engaged with other employees in hoisting ice to the top of a car by means of a large sawhorse placed on the tops of two cars standing side by side cannot recover for an injury caused by the horse tipping over because of his negligence or that of his fellow servants in pulling laterally instead of perpendicularly in 54 L. R. A.

hoisting the ice. Tobin v. Friedman Mfg. Co. (1896) 67 Ill. App. 149.

Injuries sustained by a railway employee, who, with other hands, was carrying a rail, caused by the hands at the other end dropping it upon the section boss's order before he and the other hands at his end were ready, are not due to the order, but either to his own disobedience of the order, or to the negligence of the other workmen. Coffman v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1892) 18 Ky. L. Rep. 866, 18 S. W. 1012.

An employer is not liable for injuries sustained in removing pieces of lumber, the cause of the accident being the act of one left in charge of the work by the foreman while he was temporarily absent, in releasing his hold upon a pile of rims which he was supporting while the employee was removing the lumber. Hodges v. Standard Wheel Co. (1899) 152 Ind. 680, 52 N. E. 391, 54 N. E. 383.

The duty of a master to provide a safe place for the employees, in which to do their work, does not extend to conditions which the employees create in the performance and, as a detail of their work, as where the employees in shoveling coal leave an overhanging frozen crust of coal, which falls and injures one of them. Miller v. Thomas (1897) 15 App. Div. 105, 44 N. Y. Supp. 277.

Where a servant of a railway company is injured while putting a hose on an engine tender by the falling of loose coal dislodged by another servant standing on the tender to receive the hose, the company, its negligence in overloading the coal not being the proximate cause of the accident, is not liable. Welsel v. Eastern R. Co. (1900) 79 Minn. 245, 82 N. W. 578.

An employee of a railroad company cannot recover damages of the company for an injury received by the falling of a pile of lumber, caused by the negligence of himself and of his co-employees. Langlois v. Maine C. R. Co. (1892) 84 Me. 161, 24 Atl. 804.

A laborer injured by the fall of a steel ingot from a mass of such ingots, carelessly piled by his fellow laborers in the same employment, cannot recover of the employer. Nash v. Nashua Iron & Steel Co. (1882) 62 N. H. 406.

A laborer engaged in loading boxes on a railway car cannot recover for injuries due to the fact that they were unsafely piled and fell when he climbed on them. Such a danger is one incident to the progress of the work. Carolan v. Southern P. Co. (1897) 84 Fed. 84.

An employee is a fellow servant with a foreman by whose negligence in throwing a box upon a pile of iron posts the former was injured, where the latter was doing nothing which it was the master's duty to do. Di Marcho v. Builders Iron Foundry (1894) 18 R. I. 514, 28 Atl. 661.

A foreman acts as a fellow servant of his subordinates in moving loose stones which support a large rock, and thereby causing it to fall. Ross v. Union Cement & Lime Co. (1900) 25 Ind. App. 463, 58 N. E. 500.

13. Failing to prevent explosions.

A railroad company is not liable for the death of a fireman caused by the explosion of the boiler of a locomotive engine, where such explosion was due to the fact that the water was permitted by the engineer to get too low while running at night, if the boiler was properly supplied with gauge cocks to test the height and adequacy of the water. Leary v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. (1894) 76 Hun. 575, 28 N. Y. Supp. 187.

An employee in a fruit-canning factory does not cease to be a fellow servant of another employee, merely because he is directed by the superintendent to look after a barrel used for heating water with steam, and the employer is therefore not liable for his negligence in inserting or failing to remove a plug from the pipe through which the steam escapes, causing an explosion of the barrel. Crowell v. Thomas (1897) 18 App. Div. 520, 46 N. Y. Supp. 137.

A natural gas company is not liable for an injury to a servant from an explosion caused by the striking of a match by a fellow workman to light his pipe. Allegheny Heating Co. v. Rohan (1888) 118 Pa. 223, 11 Atl. 789.

14. Work of blasting.

See also V. b, e, supra.

To place and set off blasts in a mine is the function of a mere servant. Anderson v. Daly Min. Co. (1897) 16 Utah, 28, 50 Pac. 815.

15. Failing to keep floors clean.

An employee was injured by falling upon a slippery floor, rendered so by grease left thereon by two other employees, who had been directed by defendant's foreman to clean out a pit formerly occupied by the gearing of a machine. It was held that the injury was caused by a fellow servant, for whose carelessness the master was not liable. Burke v. National India Rubber Co. (1897) 21 R. I. 446, 44 Atl. 307.

16. Exposing the servant to excessive heat.

An employer is not liable for the death of an employee engaged in cleaning an oven used for heating air to be blown into a blast furnace, by the unexplained opening of a cock letting on through such oven the blast of air heated to nearly 1,000 degrees. Dana v. Crown Point Iron Co. (1893) 51 N. Y. S. R. 238, 22 N. Y. Supp. 455.

17. Failing to keep place of work properly ventilated.

An employer who furnishes a suitable place for a given machine and a particular kind of work, and instructs his foreman to ventilate the room by opening the windows when the machine is in use, is not liable for an accident to a workman caused by the foreman's failure on a particular occasion to open the windows. McGuerty v. Hale (1894) 161 Mass. 51, 36 N. E. 682 (plaintiff became dizzy from the smell of benzine, and was injured by uncovered gearing while he was attempting to adjust the parts of a machine.)

18. Failing to keep place of work properly lighted.

Where, in an action by a servant against his master for an injury partially resulting from a dark molding room, it appeared that the company furnished an adequate lighting plant, and that the gas could have been lighted by the servant, it is error to instruct that the question of the gas being lighted, and whether any negligence was to be imputed to the defendant, was for the jury, as the duty to light the gas was not on the defendant. Hall v. United States Radiator Co. (1900) 52 App. Div. 90, 64 N. Y. Supp. 1002.

There can be no recovery for injuries received by a stevedore or other employee on a ship, who falls through an open hatchway which is left insufficiently lighted through the negligence of a coemployee. McCarthy v. Bristol Shipowners' Co. (1883) Ir. L. R. 10 C. L. 384; Byrne v. Fennell (1882) Ir. L. R. 10 C. L. 307; Mellen v. Thomas Wilson Sons & Co. (1893) 159 Mass. 34, 34 N. E. 96 (injuries received by falling down a dark hatchway usually lighted by electric lights, because they were not going at the 54 L. R. A.

time owing to an accident that might have been remedied by the engineer, and other lights available were not put in place owing to the negligence of another employee).

19. Exposing servant to peril from uncovered hatchways or other dangerous openings.

Where injuries are received from a fall through a scuttle there can be no recovery where the inference from the evidence is that the cause of the accident was a temporary misplacement of the cover, which permitted the cover to tilt under the plaintiff's weight, and that the cause of the misplacement was the hauling of trucks over the cover by the plaintiff's fellow-workmen. The Theresina (1887) 31 Fed. 90; Kraeff v. Mayer (1896) 92 Wis. 252, 65 N. W. 1032 (existence of negligence on owner's part denied, as the stevedore and his fellow servants had, under the customary procedure, full control of the physical conditions).

The owner of a ship is not liable to an employee for negligence of the master, mate, or other officer in failing to close the doors of the gangway at night. Geoghegan v. Atlas S. S. Co. (1895) 146 N. Y. 369, 40 N. E. 507.

The failure to secure a removable section of a ship's railing is the negligence of a mere servant. Quebec S. S. Co. v. Merchant (1890) 133 U. S. 875, 33 L. ed. 656, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 397. Compare the ruling in Hedley v. Pinkney & Sons S. S. Co. [1892] 1 Q. B. 58, affirmed [1894] A. C. 222, that to leave a removable railing out of place while a ship was on a voyage (the consequence being that a seaman was thrown overboard by a lurch) was not a breach of the merchant shipping act 1876, § 5, which imposed on the owner and master of a ship an obligation to put and keep her in a "seaworthy condition." See III. a, 1, supra, where some extracts from the opinions are given.

There can be no recovery for injuries caused by the failure of a fellow servant to replace the planking which is used to cover a pit, when it is not in use. Soffeld v. Guggenheim Smelting Co. (1900) 64 N. J. L. 605, 50 L. R. A. 417, 46 Atl. 711; Filbert v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1890) 121 N. Y. 207, 23 N. E. 1104.

The leaving open of a hatchway by a squad of laborers is the act of fellow servants which will preclude recovery by a member of such squad for injuries from falling through such hatchway, where the duty of covering and uncovering it rests upon such squad. The Louisiana (1896) 21 C. C. A. 60, 41 U. S. App. 324, 74 Fed. 748. To same effect, see Karl v. Maillard (1858) 3 Bosw. 591 (stress was laid on the fact that the hatchway was opened without authority); Baron v. Detroit & C. Steam Nav. Co. (1892) 91 Mich. 585, 52 N. W. 22.

20. Handling ships in docks.

A foreman of a dock, who at the time the accident occurred was engaged in superintending the raising of a vessel, is not, as to such act, the alter ego of the dock company; and it cannot upon that ground be held liable for his negligence or for his errors of judgment in directing the work. Hart v. New York Floating Dry Dock Co. (1882) 16 Jones & S. 460 (vessel suddenly careened and fell on plaintiff).

21. Navigating ships.

In The Queen (1880) 40 Fed. 694, it was sought to hold the ship liable for the negligence of the officers in having too long a hawser, in a dense fog, in a fan-way, and in not having any whistle or other signal to indicate her presence in a very dangerous place. The court said: "These faults arose in the details of navigation

—a work in which all the ship's company were alike employed in their several grades. As to such details the seamen, as fellow servants, took the risk of each other's negligence. . . . It would be absurd to say that the owners owed a duty to the seamen that too long a hawser should never be used, or that signals in a fog should be properly given by their own vessel. These details belong to the ordinary work of navigation, and to the men employed to conduct it. As to this work, the owners owe no duty to the officers or seamen to see it properly performed. The duty lies the other way, viz., from the ship's company to the owners. None of such acts, moreover, belong to the master to do as the alter ego or special representative of the owner, as in Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Ross (1884) 112 U. S. 377, 28 L. ed. 787, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 184. They may be all performed, and for the most part usually are directed and performed, by others than the master. Though there are many acts in the care and management of the ship and of the voyage, in which the master acts as the representative of the owners, and performs the duties and functions of the owners, such as the maintenance of the ship and her apparel in a safe and seaworthy condition, procuring repairs and supplies, freighting the ship, arranging her voyages, her times and places of sailing and stopping, and the discharge of all the general duties and legal obligations of the ship to the seamen, for which acts, if negligently performed, the owners are responsible to the seaman injured, they are not responsible for negligence in the mere details of the ordinary work of navigation on board the ship; because these acts are not at all duties of the master as the alter ego or representative of the owner, nor are they acts as to which the owner owes any duty to the seamen. As to third persons, all the ship's company represent the owner in the work assigned them, and their negligence makes the owner liable. As between themselves, no one more than another, in the ordinary work of navigation, represents the owner, or performs an owner's duty, and therefore each takes the risk of the other's negligence." The judgment accordingly provided that the seamen on board one of two vessels, who had been injured in a collision caused by the negligence of both crews, could only recover one half of the sums respectively assessed and allowed to them as damages.

A mate in managing a pilot boat acts as a mere servant. Carlson v. United New York Sandy Hook Pilots' Asso. (1899) 93 Fed. 468.

22. Driving horses.

An employee is not liable for injuries received by one servant owing to the negligent driving of another. Dwyer v. American Exp. Co. (1892) 82 Wis. 307, 52 N. W. 304.

p. Negligence in the transmission of the master's orders to other servants.

Compare cases as to signals V. 1, supra.

In transmitting the master's orders to other servants an employee is regarded as being in the performance of a merely ministerial duty. No damages therefore can be recovered for injuries caused by negligence in the discharge of that duty, whatever may be the agency employed for bringing the orders to the knowledge of those whose actions will be affected by them. Most of the cases illustrating this principle relate to the position of the telegraph operators of railway companies. In so far as these employees are not exercising any discretionary powers in regulating the movements of the trains (III. m. 1, 2, supra), they are by all the courts held to be fellow servants of trainmen.

The whole duty of a railroad company is performed when it has promulgated rules which, if observed and followed by the subordinates who have to carry them out, will bring personal notice to everyone concerned of any special deviation from its time-table in regard to the running of its trains, and it is not liable for an injury caused to a fireman by the carelessness of operators and conductors in executing an order of the train despatcher to stop a train at a certain station. The servant's action cannot, under such circumstances, be maintained on the theory that the order so given was a change of the rules of the road. Slater v. Jewett (1881) 85 N. Y. 61, 29 Am. Rep. 627. The court said: "It cannot be contended that there was anything required of the conductor that raised him out of his relation to the intestate of a fellow servant. The act required of the conductor at the particular time was to receive an order from an authorized source of command, and in a prescribed mode to acknowledge the receipt of it, and then to follow the direction. This was service merely. . . . There is more plausibility in the position that the act that was to be done on this occasion was so essentially one for the master to do in his duty to his servants that whatever subordinate was taken by him to do it came to be the master in doing it. It is urged, and with reason, that clearly arranging and promulgating the general time-table of a great railway is the duty and the act of the master of it; that when there is a variation from the general time-table for a special occasion and purpose, it is as much the duty and act of the master, and he is as much required to perform it; that it is the duty and act of the master to see and know that his general time-table is brought to the knowledge of his servants, who are to square their actions to it; that the same is his duty and act as to a variation from it, which is but a special time-table; and that, therefore, whoever he uses to bring those time-tables to the notice of his servants, he puts that person in his place to do an act in his stead inasmuch as the responsibility is upon him to see and know that it is done and done effectually; and that if, instead of doing it in person, he chooses to do it through an agent, that agent, pro hac vice, is he, the master, and he, the master, is responsible for a negligent act therein of that agent, whereby a fellow servant of him is harmed. The rule has been laid down in repeated cases in this court, in terms so broad as to come close to this case. Flike v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1873) 53 N. Y. 549, 13 Am. Rep. 545; Fuller v. Jewett (1880) 80 N. Y. 46, 38 Am. Rep. 575; Crispin v. Babbitt (1880) 81 N. Y. 516, 37 Am. Rep. 521. Attentive consideration, however, will perceive a distinction between the cases. That the master has the right, as regards his servants, to vary from the time-table that he has set cannot be doubted. It is at times a necessity so to do, and a necessity so frequent as to fall within the occurrences that a railway servant is bound to expect in the course of his employment. Even as regards the public and passengers, a railway manager has a right, when needs press, to vary from his general time-table. All that can then be required from him, by the public and passengers, is that when he makes the variation, he acts under it with reasonable care and diligence (Sears v. Eastern R. Co. [1867] 14 Allen, 483, 92 Am. Dec. 780; Gordon v. Manchester & L. R. Co. [1873] 52 N. H. 596, 13 Am. Rep. 97); that is to say, due care and diligence in giving notice of the change, and in running the train upon the changed time. A servant cannot ask for or expect more than this. . . . We think that it is a misconception of the case to hold that the order of the train despatcher was a change of the rules of the road, as established and promulgated by the superintendent. The train despatcher acted in exact accord with the general rules and regulations which foresaw, and with minuteness provided for, such an occasion as this, as much and as fully, so far as we can see from the case, as for the ordinary running of trains on the general time card. The order of the train despatcher was but a carrying out of those rules, and an application of certain provisions of them to a case for which they were made, and the arising of which had been foreseen as probable. In what other way could they be carried out in the detail of them, but through the service of the servants previously chosen and assigned to their parts? And can it with propriety be said that the parts of that detail are acts of the master, that he must do himself, or be liable for their negligent doing?" After laying down the principle that the master's liability depends on the character of the negligent act, the court proceeded thus: "The query, then, is in the case before us, Is it the duty of the master to give personal notice to every operative of a train of a special deviation from an established general time-table, or is his duty done when he has beforehand provided rules, minute, explicit, and efficient, and made them known to his servants, which, if observed and followed by all concerned, will bring such personal notice to every one entitled to it? We think that in the circumstances of this case the latter clause of the query propounds the true rule, and should be answered affirmatively. It is the duty of the master to provide rules and regulations for the running of the trains. He has done so here. One of them is that by telegraphic message, sent at any time through operators at the ends of the wires, to the conductor and engineer of a train, that train may be stopped at a station, or hurried forward to another, or made to go out of general order. These rules with that provision are made known to all servants. If, when the intestate entered the employment of the defendant, these rules had been read to him, and his especial attention called to this one, and he had agreed to serve under it, would not he have taken the risk of the carelessness of the operators and conductor in carrying it out? Is this case any different in substance from that? Really, by entering the employment with these rules in force, he did in effect agree that special orders might be so sent. The bargain between him and the defendant was not only that special orders might be given interfering with the general time-table, but that they might be given in this way. It is this feature of the case that distinguished it from some of those that we have cited."

One of the Federal circuit courts of appeals has also held that a local telegraph operator receiving and delivering the orders of a train despatcher to the person in charge of a train in respect to a change in the schedule is a fellow servant of the latter. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. v. Frost (1896) 21 C. C. A. 186, 44 U. S. App. 606, 74 Fed. 965 (dissenting, Hawley, J.). The court, in discussing the correctness of the charge of the trial judge, that it was the duty of the railroad company to give notice that it had changed the time of running the trains, that, if it intrusted that duty to the telegraph operator, his acts were the acts of the company, and that, if he was negligent in this matter, it was the negligence of the company, said: "The ordinary running of the train is established by a fixed schedule, of which all operatives have notice, and by which their acts must be governed. When occasion arises to disturb the regular schedule the duty rests upon the company to give timely notice to those that are to be affected thereby. This it is the office of the train despatcher to do. But when he has given that information to a local operator, is that duty discharged, or does there rest upon the company the further obligation to see that all of its servants through whose hands that message goes on its way to the train employees shall deliver it as given, and that in case of any failure in the line of communication, the company shall be liable for the resulting injury? In support of the latter view it is argued that, if the duty to notify the train operatives of a change in the time-table is personal to the company, and cannot be delegated to the servant so as to excuse the company from liability, it follows that such power, since it may not be delegated to one servant, may not be delegated by him to another; and that the reasons which lead to the conclusion that the train despatcher is a vice principal lead directly to the further conclusion that the local telegraph operator stands in the same attitude to the company, and that the duty the company owes of furnishing a safe place of operation to its employees cannot be discharged short of actual notice to those who are to be affected thereby, and whose personal safety is dependent thereupon. After a careful consideration of the question, and of the strong reasons that may be urged in support of either view of this proposition, it is our conclusion that the better doctrine is that the local telegraph operator is the fellow servant of those who are in the control and management of the train. It is evident, and the court will take judicial notice of the fact, that a disturbance in the regular time schedule of trains is frequent and necessary in the operation of all railroads. It then becomes necessary to issue special orders for their direction. Conductors, engineers, and brakemen have knowledge of that fact, and they know when they enter into the employment of the railroad company that their notice of such orders must come through the local telegraph operator at the station, and that they incur the risk of accident through his negligence or mistake. The special orders issue in the first instance from the train despatcher. It is obviously impossible for him to give personal notice to all who are to be governed thereby. The orders must of necessity be conveyed to someone in behalf of the others. The local telegraph operator, the conductor, the engineer, and the brakemen are all engaged in a common employment,—that of moving the train. The operator, it is true, is subject to no personal risk from any change in the time card, but that fact is not a controlling one in deciding who are his fellow servants. There must be some point where the responsibility of the company ceases. If it does not cease at the time when information is given to the operator, where shall it cease? Could it be said that a conductor who received from the operator a message from the train despatcher, yet who failed to guide his action thereby, stands in the relation of vice principal to the conductor, engineer, or brakeman of another train who may be injured by his negligence, or that, if the operator should receive instructions from the train despatcher to send out a flagman to signal an approaching train, the company is responsible for the negligence of such flagman in failing to carry out such instructions? It seems just in principle to hold that the company has discharged its duty when it has given information to one of its servants, who is engaged in the common employment of the others that are to be affected thereby, and has instructed him to notify his co-employees; and that, when the company has exercised due care in selecting such local operator in the first instance, and has not been negligent in employing or retaining him in his office,

Very similar is the reasoning in a case decided in another circuit (Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Camp [1895] 13 C. C. A. 233, 31 U. S. App. 213, 65 Fed. 952): "He [the telegraph operator] and the engineer and the conductor work together, at the same time and place, for a common employer, with an immediate common object, namely, the proper running of trains. It is essential, in the operating department of a railroad company, that there should be provision for communicating to those in charge of different trains the whereabouts of other trains, to avoid collision. This information is given by means of the general time-table and general rules for the running of trains with reference to each other, which the employees in charge of each train are obliged implicitly to obey. But it often happens that the general time-table must be varied from, and these variations must be communicated to those in charge of trains. This is effected usually by telegraphic orders from the superintendent or the train despatcher, who has supreme control of the running of trains. The information is also communicated by means of flagmen, by means of torpedoes, by red lights and green lights upon trains, by the block signal system, and in other ways. The subordinate employees, whose duty it is to transmit the orders of the officer in control, or to give information as to the presence of trains upon any part of the track, without special orders, are engaged at the same time and place with the persons operating the train, in a common employment, having an immediate, common object, namely, that of the running of trains, and therefore are fellow servants. The man who makes the signal at the station to the engineer on the approaching train to stop is as much engaged in the running and operation of that train as the flagman sent out ahead to signal the condition of a switch. . . . There can be no separation of the signal department and the operating department, for the employees engaged upon the train, in the actual, manual operation of the train, are expected to be part of the signal department of the company. The man who puts out the green light at the back of the train, to indicate that a train is following, communicates to every station agent, every conductor, and every engineer who sees it, knowledge upon which they, each of them, must act, and yet it can hardly be said that the brakeman, in displaying this green light, is acting in a different department from the man who opens and closes the throttle valve of the engine." See also Illinois C. R. Co. v. Bents (1900) 40 C. C. A. 56, 99 Fed. 657 (railroad company is not liable for the death of an engineer in a collision, due to the negligence of an operator in failing to report the passing of a train at his station).

Where an engineer was killed through the negligence of a telegraph operator at one of the stations on the defendant's road, in failing to notify the conductor of the train of a fact telegraphed to him from the station ahead which would require him to slacken speed and to cross over a switch on to another track at a given point, the consequence being that the engine driven by the intestate jumped the track and caused his death, the court held that the telegraph operator was a fellow servant with the engineer. Dealey v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (1886: Pa.) 8 Cent. Rep. 112, 4 Atl. 170. In this case the court considered that the main duty of a telegraph operator is the receipt and delivery of messages regarding the running of trains upon the roadway, in which he is merely the automaton or communicator to give the information as to the condition of the track ahead of the moving train, and part of the general machinery by which the whole roadway is operated.

The same doctrine is applied in the following cases: McKalg v. Northern P. R. Co. (1889) 42 Fed. 288; Monaghan v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1887) 45 Hun, 113, where the correctness of the application of the general principle seems rather questionable, as the operator had the duty of controlling the movements of trains at a particular point under a temporary system organized by the company in view of the fact that the progress of certain alterations in the track rendered it necessary to run all trains going in one direction on a single track.—Dana v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1881) 23 Hun, 473 (message misinterpreted—case appealed, but merely on the question of the insufficiency of the company's rules). See also Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Clark (1893) 6 C. C. A. 281, 16 U. S. App. 17, 57 Fed. 125, where, however, the nonliability was predicated directly from the fact that the operator was at all events a fellow servant as to the negligent act which caused the injury, viz., in not putting out proper signals for passing trains, and thus seeing that no train passed within less than ten minutes of another.

But the principle itself is equally applicable where other methods of transmitting the master's commands are involved in the case.

In Card v. Eddy (1894; Mo.) 28 S. W. 979, a section foreman was held not to be entitled to recover where a fireman undertook to deliver to him a telegraphic despatch by tying it to a lump of coal, and in throwing the lump off inadvertently struck him. The court said: "The act the fireman was required to perform was the delivery from a running train of a message to the plaintiff. It cannot matter how important the message may have been, nor that it contained an order the receivers, through their road master, or other agent, were required to give. The injury did not result from the nature of the message or from a failure to transmit it. The service required of the fireman was that of a servant, which any messenger could have performed, and the manner of its delivery did not pertain to the duty the receivers owed to plaintiff. They owed him the duty only of using reasonable care to select a competent and careful messenger. After the master has discharged the duty he owes his servants, such as proper care in the selection of those with whom they are required to work, providing suitable tools and machinery, etc., yet the servants must look to each other for protection in the performance of their respective duties. The fireman can be regarded as the agent or vice principal of the receivers under no test which has ever been applied by the courts of this state, or elsewhere, so far as I have been able to discover. He was given no power to superintend, control, or direct the plaintiff,—which is the usual test; nor was he performing a duty the receivers owed to plaintiff other than such as they owed to every other employee in their service."

VI. Negligence of coservant in respect to the preparation or structural modification of instrumentalities or their parts; when not imputed to the master.

As to cases in which the delinquency resolves itself into negligently selecting, or failing to use, the appliances to be adjusted, see also V. b. 1, supra.

a. Introductory.

the duty of taking care that the servant is not exposed to danger from what may be called intrinsic defects in the instrumentalities is deemed to be nondelegable. But this principle is subject to some important qualifications, the precise extent of which is, as the authorities now stand, a matter of uncertainty.

It may perhaps be taken as a proposition universally conceded that the right and liabilities of the master and servant are to be gauged with reference to the principle that, where the master furnishes the materials for securing the safety of the servant as the work progresses in a place the condition of which is constantly changing, the use and application of those materials according to the exigencies of the work is the duty of the servants themselves, unless that function is specially assumed by the master. Floyd v. Sugden (1883) 134 Mass. 563.

But the practical construction of a rule so broadly expressed as this obviously affords scope for infinite differences of opinion. The reports carry us, by gradations sometimes almost imperceptible, from cases involving groups of facts which may without difficulty be admitted to be such that recovery could not have been allowed consistently with any reasonable interpretation of the doctrine of common employment, to cases which virtually nullify in some very important respects the theory that the master must answer for the negligence of the employees who provide the place of work and other appliances. Judicial ingenuity has been taxed to the utmost for the purpose of discovering distinctions of sufficient importance to take the evidence out of the operation of this theory.

In Hamilton v. Rich Hill Coal Min. Co. (1891) 108 Mo. 364, 18 S. W. 977, one of the most eminent of modern judges protested against whittling away by refined exceptions the rule by which the master is required to provide suitable appliances, and no one who has had occasion to carry out any extensive researches among decisions of this class will say that this caution is unnecessary.

The desperate predicament in which the courts sometimes involve themselves in the attempt to deal with antagonistic principles at places where they overlap has assuredly never been more strikingly illustrated than by the recent remark of a New Jersey judge that "a duty may be ambiguous, or may have a double aspect, and be, in some sense, incumbent on the master and on the fellow servant," and that "such a problem may, perhaps, be solved by determining which duty is paramount over the other." Flanigan v. Guggenheim Smelting Co. (1899) 63 N. J. L. 647, 44 Atl. 702. What more "lame and impotent conclusion" could be reached than the conception of a duty which may be regarded as the master's or the servant's according to the standpoint from which it is viewed, and the suggestion that the rights and liabilities of the parties should be settled by an unintelligible method of analysis? When such a confession of helplessness is forced from a judge, it seems to be high time for the legislature to play the part of a deus ex machina.

b. Negligence which produces structural unsafety of a temporary character.

It seems to be well settled that, in the absence of evidence going to show that the conditions which caused the injury were, or ought to have been, known to the master or the agent whose special function it is to see that the instrumentality in question is reasonably safe for use (see VII. f, infra), no action can be maintained for injuries caused by details of work which temporarily result in introducing some structural modification into the environment of the injured person.

1. Defects in railway tracks.

Contrast cases in III. d, 1, 2, supra.

Where the evidence is that, in the operation of a railroad at a certain point, it was frequently necessary to remove temporarily the planks covering a pit for the purpose of making repairs thereon, and that the employees were repeatedly instructed to cover the pit when the repairs were finished, the efficient cause of an accident resulting from the pit being left uncovered is the carelessness of coservants, and not an imperfection of the road. Filbert v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1890) 121 N. Y. 207, 23 N. E. 1104.

A brakeman who knows of a lumber pile near the track, and is injured in jumping upon a train moving by the pile, cannot recover if the piling of the lumber was an act of a fellow servant. Gaffney v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (1887) 15 R. I. 456, 7 Atl. 284.

Where a deposit of sand alongside a railway track results in injury to a brakeman, the injury is regarded as being due to the act of a mere fellow servant. Robinson v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. (1877) 46 Tex. 540.

A brakeman who, in coupling cars in a yard, slips on a pile of wet ashes, dropped from a locomotive fire-box and left between the rails, cannot recover. Hughes v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. (1880) 27 Minn. 137, 6 N. W. 553.

A railway company is not liable for the death of a brakeman who was brushed off the train by a car placed by fellow servants on a side track in dangerous proximity to the main track. Schaub v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1891) 106 Mo. 74, 16 S. W. 924.

2. Displacement of guards provided for dangerous machinery.

The negligence of servants charged with the duty necessarily involved in the ordinary use of machines, of oiling the same and changing the rolls operated in connection therewith, in failing to replace the guard over the gearing after oiling it, is not chargeable to the master so as to render him liable for injuries to another workman employed to tend the machine, where the oiling of the machinery and the changing of the rolls required no special skill, and might properly have been intrusted to the person injured. Wosbigian v. Washburn & M. Mfg. Co. (1896) 187 Mass. 20, 44 N. E. 1058. The court said: "The men who tended the machines were not accustomed to oil them and change the rolls, but two other men were regularly employed to do this. Were these men doing a part of the work that was within the department of the master, whose duty it was to furnish his servants with tools and machinery as suitable and safe as the exercise of reasonable care would secure, or were they doing the work of mere servants in making necessary changes of parts incident to the management of the machines in the ordinary use of them? If these changes had regularly been made in the ordinary course of their business by the persons who tended the machines, there would have been no doubt that in making them they would have been mere servants, for whose negligence the master would not be liable, and to whom, if competent, he could trust the work without any other duty than to furnish them proper materials and appliances for carrying it on. The only ground for doubt arises from the fact that the work was done by machinists who were specially employed for that purpose. But it appears that there was work to be done in repairing the rolls which were taken out, and in fitting them for use again, which could not be done by ordinary persons who were only taught to tend the machines, and which called for the employment of machinists. So far as appears, the changing of the rolls and oiling of the machines was a simple kind of work, which the machine tenders might have done as well as others. We are of opinion that these changes were necessarily involved in the ordinary use of the machines, and could properly be left to competent servants as a part of their work of managing the machines that called for no attention by the master if he kept the workmen properly supplied with suitable rolls and other necessary articles."

An employer cannot be held liable for the negligence of a coservant in displacing a plank which forms part of the fence by which dangerous machinery is protected in accordance with the provision of a statute requiring such protection to be furnished. Honor v. Albrighton (1880) 93 Pa. 475.

3. Dangers supervening in excavation work; trenches, mines, quarries, etc.

Contrast cases cited in III. d, 6, supra.

A master is not liable where the foremen, or other employees whose duty it is to see that the sides of a trench are properly shored and braced, either fail to use, or use improperly or unskillfully, the materials provided for that purpose, and cause injury to other servants who are at work in the trench. Floyd v. Sugden (1883) 134 Mass. 563.

In Zeigler v. Day (1877) 123 Mass. 152, a case involving similar facts, the court said: "The work was committed to the supervision of a skillful and competent superintendent. It required for the protection of the men the frequent use of temporary structures, the location and erection of which, as the digging progressed, was a part of the work in which the superintendent and the men under him were alike employed, and for the preparation of which, as in the case of the scaffold of the mason or carpenter, the master is not liable, unless there is something to show that he assumed it as a duty independent of the servant's employment." See also Johnson v. Boston Tow-Boat Co. (1883) 135 Mass. 209; Dube v. Lewiston (1891) 83 Me. 211, 22 Atl. 112; Durst v. Carnegie Steel Co. (1890) 173 Pa. 162, 33 Atl. 1102 (plaintiff was himself excavating the trench); Dwyer v. Hickler (1891) 43 N. Y. S. R. 221, 16 N. Y. Supp. 814 (same facts); Bergquist v. Minneapolis (1890) 42 Minn. 471, 44 N. W. 530 (plaintiff was laying pipes).

It is error to refuse an instruction to the effect that the sheet-piling in a trench was a detail of the work, and that, if the failure of the foreman in charge to use such piling was the cause of the sides of the trench falling in, the plaintiff could not recover. Golden v. Sieghardt (1898) 33 App. Div. 161, 53 N. Y. Supp. 460.

The negligence of a foreman in charge of workmen engaged in excavating a trench, in continuing to drive curbing timbers into the ground in close proximity to a laborer, after discovering that they were throwing off splinters, is that of a fellow servant of the laborer, whatever may be his relation to him in other respects. Friedrich v. St. Paul (1897) 68 Minn. 402, 71 N. W. 387. See, however, Kranz v. Long Island R. Co. (1890) 123 N. Y. 1, 25 N. E. 206, VI. g, 2, infra.

Since the danger that a bank which is being taken down in a gravel pit may fall at any moment is open and obvious, and the servants engaged in the work have ample facilities for discovering and removing such danger, the master may fairly be allowed to impose upon the servants themselves the duty of providing against such an occurrence. Larsson v. McClure (1897) 35 Wis. 533, 70 N. W. 662. The 54 L. R. A.

court said: "The present case does not seem to fall within the rule that the master must furnish the servant a reasonably safe place in which to work, inasmuch as the plaintiff and his fellow servants practically created the place and its attendant perils from hour to hour, in the prosecution of their labors; and the condition was constantly shifting by reason of their own acts, of which, as well as their probable consequences, they must be held to have had notice. The negligence, if any, in this view of the case, would be that of the plaintiff and his fellow servants, and the risk of it must be regarded as assumed by the plaintiff as incident to his employment; and, in any view that may be taken of the case, it must be regarded as a risk assumed by the plaintiff, as incident to his employment."

A master is not liable where employees in shoveling coal leave an overhanging frozen crust of coal which falls and injures one of them. Miller v. Thomas (1897) 15 App. Div. 105, 44 N. Y. Supp. 277.

A tunnel in a mine in course of excavation, being a place in which conditions are constantly changing, and of which the furnishing and preparation are in themselves part of the work the employees are required to perform, is not a place furnished by the master for employees, within the spirit of those decisions which deny the right of the master to delegate to a servant the duty of providing a safe place for his employees. Coal & Min. Co. v. Clay (1894) 51 Ohio St. 542, sub nom. Consolidated Coal & Min. Co. v. Floyd, 25 L. R. A. 848, 38 N. E. 610.

As to the incidents or means of excavating ore, a mine owner has only the duty of furnishing competent men and suitable materials for the use of those engaged in the common employment. Hence, the negligence of a mine foreman in having too large a space mined before preparing to set the supports is that of a fellow servant of a miner. Petaja v. Aurora Iron Min. Co. (1895) 106 Mich. 469, 32 L. R. A. 438, 66 N. W. 951, Affirming on rehearing 106 Mich. 463, 32 L. R. A. 435, 64 N. W. 835. The court said: "It is apparent that if we are to adhere to the holding that miners and trammers are fellow servants, and that the shift boss, like the foreman of a section gang, is not an exception, there can be no theory upon which the plaintiff can recover, except that, immediately the room was in readiness for timbers, it was the duty of the master to see that they were properly set and maintained. And it is obvious that this claim must be, as it is, planted upon the rule that, in appropriate cases, requires the master to provide a safe place. The operation of mining, in this and similar mines, is to sink a shaft, and from the shaft start a drift, from which stopes or rooms are excavated across the vein, from the lower to the upper or hanging wall. It is accomplished by caving down and removing the ore. It is manifest that this cannot proceed unless the roof is supported behind the miners, and this is done by putting up timbers to support the roof until the ore shall be excavated beyond. It is said that, when the room has been excavated sufficiently large, it is the practice to cave the room down into the mining sets, and place more timbers on top of the first. Now, if this room can properly be said to be a place furnished to the servants in which to carry on the master's business, and which he must, at his peril, keep in reasonably safe condition, as a factory or warehouse, then the case should have gone to the jury; but, if it is not such a place, then it falls within that other rule, that the duty of the master is performed by using reasonable care in furnishing suitable material, and employing capable and efficient men to do the work. . . . As we understand from the brief of counsel and the record,—and we do not discover a denial of it,—this stope or room starts from a drift at or near what is called the 'foot wall,' which is the bottom as distinguished from the overlying stratum of the vein of ore. Both foot wall and top wall depart from the level, and dip sharply, so that, in running the stope on a level, it can go but a short distance until the top or overhanging wall is reached; and then the operation is repeated above the lagging, removing the lagging and caving down the roof, supporting the new roof thus formed by new sets placed upon the first. Thus, so far as the lagging is concerned, it has a temporary use merely to enable the miners to push the breast through to the overhanging wall, by supporting the roof. It is a part of the operation of mining, as much as a blast or a staging, and is not a part of the permanent structure."

The case is for the jury, where the evidence is conflicting as to whether the plaintiff, a miner, was making his own place of work. Taylor v. Star Coal Co. (1899) 110 Iowa, 40, 81 N. W. 249 (see IV. j, supra, for general rule).

One employed by the manager of a mine to take down loose slate which is liable to fall, but not invested with any greater authority than any other laborer, is not a vice principal while so engaged, but is a fellow servant with the miners. Fosburg v. Phillips Fuel Co. (1894) 93 Iowa, 54, 61 N. W. 400.

A workman employed in a quarry, in which, by reason of the constant removal of stone therefrom in the course of its operation by himself and his fellow servants, the conditions and surroundings are constantly changing, assumes the risk of the place becoming unsafe, and cannot recover for an injury due to the falling of a mass of stone loosened by succeeding blasts. Mielke v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1899) 103 Wis. 1, 79 N. W. 22.

4. Dangers arising from the changing condition of buildings and other structures while in course of erection or repair.

The fact that a master failed to comply with a request by an employee for material to make a new floor in one place, to replace a section of floor which it had been necessary to frequently remove and replace, does not render him liable to a fellow servant of such employee for injuries due to the fact that such employee, in replacing the old floor without instructions to do so, failed to nail down the boards, where, had that been done, the floor would have been entirely safe. Nemier v. Riter (1897) 179 Pa. 557, 36 Atl. 335.

The owner of a steam propeller is not liable for an accident to an employee engaged in painting the iron floor, caused by the fall of a section of a plank floor which had been safely placed on end, but which was rendered unsafe after the commencement of the work owing to the fact that fellow servants removed other sections which helped to support it. Smith v. Empire Transp. Co. (1895) 89 Hun, 588, 35 N. Y. Supp. 534.

In Armour v. Hahn (1884) 111 U. S. 313, 28 L. ed. 440, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 455, the plaintiff, a man of full age, was, with one of his comrades, directed by their foreman to push a joist out on the sticks of timber projecting from a wall in course of erection. The usual course, as he himself testified, was to put the timber in, and leave it in that way temporarily, and afterwards build the wall up over it. The court said: "If it [the stick of timber] was at the time insecure, it was either by reason of the risks ordinarily incident to the state of things in the unfinished condition of the building, or else by reason of some negligence of one of the carpenters or brick-layers, all of whom were employed and paid by the same master, and were working in the course of their employment at the same place and time, with an immediate common object,—the erection of the building,—and, therefore, within the strictest limits of the rule of law upon the subject, fellow servants."

The selection of sound beams out of a sufficient quantity of proper and suitable material furnished by an employer for the erection of a structure is the duty of the fellow servants of one employed on such structure, instead of the duty of the master. Hence, there can be no recovery where an employee was injured by the breaking of a crossbeam upon which he was sitting while engaged in work, where such beam formed part of the structure on which he was at work. Stourbridge v. Brooklyn City R. Co. (1896) 9 App. Div. 129, 41 N. Y. Supp. 128. There the master procured the timber for a structure from a reputable dealer; as a "lot" or quantity of it was good, but some of the sticks were found defective, or with curls in them. It was therefore necessary to test the timber so that knots or curls should be cut off or rejected. With respect to this test, the court said: "We think that the master discharged its duty when it supplied a sufficient quantity of proper and suitable material; that the choice of material, the selection of sound beams, the rejection of such beams or parts as were defective, work necessarily involved in the erection of structures of wood, were details of the work and strictly the duty of the fellow servants. . . . It is here that the vital distinction occurs between the question of a place to work and that of a part of the work itself; a question of liability to employees who might use the structure when built and the liability to those engaged in building it. It may well be that, after the construction of the trolley car, the defendant would be liable to any line-man who might be injured from its defective condition, whether occasioned by the negligence of the employees who put up the structure or those who selected the materials. Such rule does not apply to the plaintiff." Discussing the contention of the plaintiff that the case fell within the principle that a master is bound to furnish a reasonably safe place for his servants to work, the court said: "If this rule is applicable to the present case, then it would follow that for the negligence of any servants to whom the master had committed the duty of providing a safe place, the master himself would be liable. I think, however, that this is not the case of a 'place' within the meaning of the rule. As stated in Butler v. Townsend (1891) 126 N. Y. 105, 26 N. E. 1017, doubtless, in one sense of the term, the employee must always be in some place, and doubtless, also, the place, in a certain sense, is not safe if an accident occurs there. But the rule that the master must provide a safe place for work only applies where the work and the place are not connected; where the work is not in the construction of the place, as in the case of a mill, a factory, mine, ship, well, etc. In the present case the cross beam was not furnished for the purpose of providing the plaintiff a place to work, but as a part of the structure which he and the other workmen were engaged in erecting. The defendant might have provided a beam of such dimensions as to have been wholly unable to sustain the plaintiff's weight; yet if good in its character, and sufficient for the purpose intended, there could have been no liability on the part of the defendant for that reason alone. I do not mean to say that the defendant owed no duty to its workmen in the premises. If there was a latent danger of which it had knowledge, it should have apprised the workmen. But the distinction I seek to impress is that here the beam was a part of the structure, the common work upon which all the employees were employed, and the use of it by the deceased for support the mere incident. In the case of nearly all buildings or structures it is the common practice to use the part of the structure that may at the time be erected as a means to enable the workmen to obtain position from which to prosecute the remaining work. It makes a vast difference in the question of the liability of the master whether, when a servant meets with an accident from a defect in the previous work, occurring through the negligence of a servant engaged in its construction, the negligence is to be deemed as arising from a failure to provide a safe place, or as negligence in the general enterprise in the prosecution of which all the workmen are engaged. If the first, the master is liable, even though the negligence is that of a servant, because the duty is that of the master; if the second it is the negligence of a co-servant, and the master is not liable for it. If the workman who placed the beams on the flanges of the elevated railroad had been negligent, and improperly fastened them, and from this cause the accident to the plaintiff's intestate had occurred, and if the case is one of a safe place, the defendant would have been liable. Still I think such a proposition would hardly be contended for. Would it not be clear that it was the negligence of a fellow workman? It is also clear from the same reasoning that the beam was not an appliance the furnishing of which was the master's duty." To the same effect is Callan v. Bull (1896) 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017, where a laborer was injured owing to the insufficient strength of one of the caps of a jetty in course of construction. There it was contended by the plaintiff that, in neglecting to provide a cap of sufficient strength to support the mat upon which he was working at the time of his injury, the defendant failed to comply with the non-delegable duty to provide a safe place of work. After laying down the general principles already quoted the court proceeded thus: "The work upon which the plaintiff was employed in the present case was to construct a jetty extending from the shore several thousand feet out into the waters of the bay. Manifestly, the place at which the work was to be done was not provided by the defendant, nor can it be said that different portions of the work in which the laborers might be engaged as it progressed were the 'place' furnished by their employer, within the meaning of the above rule, or that the bent or trestle, from which was suspended the mat on which the plaintiff was at work at the time of his injury, was one of the appliances to be furnished by the defendant. On the contrary, the making of this bent was a part of the work to be done by the laborers themselves in the construction of the jetty, and the bent was in fact made by them out of materials furnished by the defendant."

If the appliance is furnished by the master for the purpose of enabling the servants to perform the work in which they are to be engaged, he is required to see that it shall be reasonably safe for that purpose; but, if the preparation of that appliance is a part of the work which the servant is required to perform, the master is not liable for any defect in its preparation. The rule does not apply to a case where several persons are employed to do certain work, and by the contract of employment, either express or implied, the employees are to adjust the appliances by which the work is to be done.

The owner of a building upon which extensive repairs are being made is not liable for an injury to an employee caused by stepping upon a roof board which is laid in place on the roof, but which has not been nailed down. Richardson v. Anglo American Provision Co. (1897) 72 Ill. App. 77.

5. Dangers incident to the demolition of buildings.

An employer of a gang of men engaged in taking down a building is not liable for an accident caused by the tipping up of a joist from which the support at one end had been removed. Clark v. Liston (1894) 54 Ill. App. 578. The court said: "In the destruction of a building there is not an attempt or obligation to make it or any part thereof secure; on the contrary, the work of removal is one in which, in turn, each part of the structure is rendered insecure; this every workman understands."

c. Negligence in failing to adjust or secure instrumentalities or their parts while in use.

Another group of cases may be conveniently referred to the principle that the duty of the master to see to it that the machinery furnished for the use of his servants is reasonably safe does not extend so far as to require him to attend to the proper regulation of those parts which necessarily have to be adjusted in the course of the use and with regard to the particular work to be done, and the adjustment of which is incident to the ordinary use of the machine. Eicheler v. Hanggi (1889) 40 Minn. 263, 41 N. W. 975.

It will be observed, however, that, as regards the facts stated, many of the cases cited below approach quite close to those which are reviewed in the next two subdivisions, while others might perhaps with equal propriety be associated with the decisions which treat the duty of maintenance as delegable. See VII. infra.

The negligence of a fellow servant on one occasion in failing to readjust the cylinders of a machine after oiling it cannot be imputed to the master, where he was competent when selected. Ebjjian v. Woonsocket Rubber Co. (1895) 164 Mass. 214, 41 N. E. 265. The ground of the decision was that "the oiling of the machine is one of the daily matters regularly incident to its ordinary use, which must be intrusted to servants." This case was followed in Wosbigian v. Washburn & M. Mfg. Co. (1896) 167 Mass. 20, 44 N. E. 1058. VI. b, 2, supra.

The change of rollers in a feed mill for those that are sharper is a mere detail of work. Frazee v. Stott (1899) 120 Mich. 624, 79 N. W. 896.

A machine manufacturing company is not liable for injuries sustained by an employee by the falling upon him of a section of a heavy condenser, caused by the failure of himself and his coemployees to retain wooden braces between the various sections until the complete removal of a header, raised at the ends of the several sections on one side by a crane and tackle, and then coupled or bolted to each of the sections, although if a bolt which he was engaged in driving out had been put in in a different manner by the foreman the injury would not have ensued. Kliegel v. Welsel & V. Mfg. Co. (1893) 84 Wis. 148, 53 N. W. 1119.

A foreman in a mine, whose duty it is to employ and discharge workmen, direct them in their work, look after the machinery, and direct when it shall run, is a fellow servant with a workman employed by him while the two are cleaning the sprocket wheels used in running an elevator in such department; and the employer is not liable for an injury to such workman by the negligence of the foreman in failing to detach endless chains used in running the elevator, as it is his duty to do. New Pittsburgh Coal & Coke Co. v. Peterson (1896) 14 Ind. App. 634, 43 N. E. 270.

An employer is not liable for an injury resulting from a defective block and hook selected from a number available, and arranged by a fellow servant as "a temporary incident of a particular job." Harnols v. Cutting (1890) 174 Mass. 395, 54 N. E. 842.

A servant cannot recover for an injury caused by the negligence of a fellow servant in setting him to work on a movable platform without securely fastening it. Howard v. Hood (1892) 155 Mass. 391, 29 N. E. 630.

Employees engaged in loading or unloading coal are co-servants of each other as regards negligence in the splicing of pieces of rope upon buckets in which coal is hoisted, for the purpose of pulling the buckets toward the dumpers. Ryan v. Smith (1898) 29 C. C. A. 427, 56 U. S. App. 604, 85 Fed. 758.

The task of setting up or rigging appliances for stavedores, and safely maintaining them, is a part of the duty of the fellow employees of a stavedore who is injured thereby, where they are all under the charge of a foreman, who directs several of them to rig the vessel. Burns v. Bennett (1896; Cal.) 44 Pac. 1068, reiterating opinion on former appeal (1893) 99 Cal. 363, 33 Pac. 916.

Properly to use pulleys, blocks, ropes, and other ordinary tools and appliances which have been furnished by a master to the workmen employed upon a derrick is a part of the duty of the workmen. It is incidental to the management and use of the derrick. In working with a derrick the foreman and his assistants are fellow servants, and the master is not responsible to any one of them for the negligence of any other in the use of the materials and implements which the master has supplied. McKinnon v. Norcross (1889) 148 Mass. 533, 3 L. E. A. 320, 20 N. E. 138.

Where the moving, adjusting, and securing of a derrick are among the regular duties of workmen, any negligence in the manner or place of putting down a post to which one of the guy ropes is fastened is their own negligence or that of the superintendent, and the latter is a mere fellow servant of the workmen in securing the post. McGinty v. Athol Reservoir Co. (1892) 155 Mass. 183, 29 N. E. 510.

The omission of workmen to fasten a guy rope of a properly constructed derrick which is in process of being moved is negligence which cannot be imputed to the master. Marvin v. Muller (1881) 25 Hun. 163.

An employer who furnishes with all the necessary appliances a derrick intended for use in different parts of a building in the process of its construction does not owe to his employees the duty of properly setting up and supporting it at each place where it may be required. Kennedy v. Jackson Agri. Iron Works (1895) 12 Misc. 336, 33 N. Y. Supp. 630.

An employer is not liable for an injury resulting from the fall of a derrick occasioned by the absence of a check rope which a co-servant in charge had forgotten to attach thereto. Jenkinson v. Carlin (1894) 10 Misc. 22, 30 N. Y. Supp. 530.

In one New York case it was held that the owner of a derrick was not liable where a workman was injured by its defective rigging, the ropes having become stretched by the rain of the night before the morning of the accident, and the starting was superintended by the foreman who had charge of it. Courtney v. Cornell (1883) 17 Jones & S. 286. Sedgwick, Ch. J., dissented on the ground that the plaintiff "accepted the risk that would be involved in arranging the derrick and its several attachments" 54 L. R. A.

from occasion to occasion." This view seems more in harmony with the later cases.

An employee injured by the falling of a derrick on account of the neglect of a fellow servant to fasten a guy rope cannot recover of the master, who had cautioned the man never to let go a guy rope after it was untied until it had been tied again. Nellson v. Gilbert (1885) 69 Iowa, 691, 23 N. W. 666 (all the negligent acts antecedent to that of untying the guy rope and leaving it unsecured held to be remote causes of the accident).

In Peschel v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1885) 62 Wis. 338, 21 N. W. 269, the apparatus used for raising a part of the framework for a water tank consisted of a windlass crab, tackle blocks, ropes, the tank itself, and an anchor post set in the ground, the whole of these being placed in position and adjusted under the direction of the foreman. The plaintiff, a mason employed with other masons, carpenters, and section men in the erection of the tank, was injured by the fall of the framework owing to the fact that the anchor post was not set deep enough in the ground. A verdict for the defendant was set aside for reasons thus explained. The court said: "The stress of the argument is to bring the case within the rule which charges the master with the duty of supplying the servant with reasonably safe and suitable machinery and appliances to do his work. But, as I have said, I see no sufficient reason for saying the defendant was under obligation to furnish the men employed to erect the water tank and windmill with a machine or instrumentality for raising the bents in a complete condition ready for use. There is no claim that the materials and appliances provided were not suitable and sufficient for the purpose intended. They were in a detached condition, and necessarily had to be adjusted on the ground; but the defendant did not contract with the plaintiff that these various appliances should be adjusted and put in order fit for use before he went to work. On the contrary, it was what the foreman, Brooks, with his gang of men, including the plaintiff, was employed to do, to take the materials of stone and wood, and all other appliances, and build the piers, construct the tank, frame the bents, adjust the machinery, and hoist the bents to their proper position. All this labor was necessarily involved in what they undertook to do and were paid for doing. It is unsound reasoning to compare this hoisting apparatus to a steam engine, a railroad car, or to some machine which is all adjusted so that its sufficiency can be ascertained before the servant is called upon to use it. Here the materials had to be prepared and put together, frames made, and hoisting apparatus adjusted—which included the setting of the anchor post—by the men themselves; and, to use the forcible and pertinent language of defendant's attorneys on this point, if placing the post in the ground, in this particular case, was a duty which the master owed to the servant, then in doing work of this kind the rule as to nonliability for the negligent acts of fellow servants would be practically nullified. If in the adjustment of this machinery a pulley, although perfect in itself, had been improperly placed or secured; if the anchor rope, although proper and sufficient in itself, had been insecurely tied to the post and slipped therefrom; if one of the men, furnished with a proper crowbar, had negligently held it at the foot of the bent; if the framework made by the men themselves, in the shape of timbers underneath the bents and upon which they rested, had been improperly made,—the logic of the position of plaintiff's counsel would make the master liable in all the cases supposed for an injury caused by such negligence of a fellow servant. This is, indeed, extending the liability of the master further than the adjudications of this court have carried it, and further than the law will warrant."

Where a piece of iron used as a counter balance of a lathe flies off and strikes a servant he cannot recover where the evidence shows that if there was any negligence it was that of the foreman of the lathe in not securing the weight, and that this weight was as safe as any other piece of iron if it had been properly secured. Faber v. Carlisle Mfg. Co. (1889) 126 Pa. 387, 17 Atl. 621.

An employee cannot recover for injuries which, upon the evidence, could have been occasioned only by the loosening of a button upon a carding machine, owing to the neglect of a fellow servant to tighten a screw. Smith v. Lowell Mfg. Co. (1878) 124 Mass. 114.

A foreman superintending the construction of a bridge acts as a mere servant in choosing the method of fastening the tackle employed. Ulrich v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1898) 25 App. Div. 465, 51 N. Y. Supp. 5.

A master is not liable for the negligence of a fellow servant in so placing a suitable rope as to be cut and weakened unnecessarily. Prescott v. Dall Engine Co. (1896) 176 Pa. 459, 35 Atl. 224.

A servant whose duty it is to superintend the laying of temporary rails leading to a ballast pit, and to change their position as the work progresses, is a fellow servant of a laborer engaged in filling trucks with ballast. Lovegrove v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. (1864) 16 C. B. N. S. 669, 33 L. J. C. P. N. S. 329, 10 Jur. N. S. 879, 10 L. T. N. S. 718, 12 Week. Rep. 988. But the case was not decided with reference to the character of the act.

An employer is not liable for injuries caused by the failure of a fellow servant to fasten properly a skid, bridge, plank, or other similar instrumentality used for the purpose of transferring goods from or to ships, railway cars, etc. The Islands (1886) 28 Fed. 478 (here it was shown that the usual practice preferred by the workmen themselves was not to tie the skid); Hudson v. Ocean S. S. Co. (1888) 110 N. Y. 625, 17 N. E. 342; McCampbell v. Cunard S. S. Co. (1895) 144 N. Y. 552, 39 N. E. 637 (some stress was laid on the fact that the appliance—a skid—was of simple construction, but this factor is not material, as is shown by the authorities here referred to); Dwyer v. Hall (1897) 21 Misc. 452, 47 N. Y. Supp. 630, Reversing 20 Misc. 677, 46 N. Y. Supp. 533; Conway v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1895) 13 Misc. 53, 34 N. Y. Supp. 113, Reversing 11 Misc. 641, 32 N. Y. Supp. 921.

Where a master employing plaintiff's intestate and others to load a vessel furnished a proper clamp and ropes with which to safely lash it to the deck beam, and the clamp was not lashed but insecurely attached by one bolt, by direction of the master's foreman, and in consequence of this insecure fastening a barrel in process of loading slipped and fatally injured plaintiff's intestate, defendant is not liable for his foreman's negligence. O'Connor v. Hall (1900) 52 App. Div. 428, 65 N. Y. Supp. 136.

Putting a gang plank into position for the purpose of loading a heavy piece of machinery in a railway car is the function of a mere servant. Trimble v. Whitin Mach. Works (1898) 172 Mass. 150, 51 N. E. 463.

A master is not liable for the improper setting of a ladder by a fellow servant of the injured person. Trcka v. Burlington, C. R. & N. E. Co. (1896) 100 Iowa, 206, 69 N. W. 422.

A master is not liable for an injury caused by the insecure fastening of a ladder which it was the duty of the employee and his coservants to fasten. Quinn v. Fish (1893) 6 Misc. 105, 26 N. Y. Supp. 10.

d. Negligence in the preparation of temporary structures or other instrumentalities as a part of the work; general rule.

We now come to the decisions which cut most deeply into the doctrine of nondelegable duties, those, namely, in which the preparation of entire instrumentalities, and not merely their arrangement or adjustment of their parts, is treated as the function of the servants themselves. The general rule to which, for reasons to be explained in the following section, the courts have now committed themselves, may be stated thus: If the master supplies suitable material for the construction of an appliance which he is not obliged and has not undertaken to furnish in a completed state, and the workmen themselves construct it according to their own judgment, the master is not liable for the manner in which they use the materials thus supplied. Kimmer v. Weber (1897) 151 N. Y. 417, 45 N. E. 860, Reversing (1894) 81 Hun, 599, 30 N. Y. Supp. 1103.

Persons engaged in the same general work are fellow servants in respect to the negligence of one of them in constructing appliances with which they are to work, where their work includes the construction of such appliances. Marsh v. Herman (1891) 47 Minn. 537, 50 N. W. 611.

The master is never liable for failing to supply a safe place to work, where the work consists in making safe the place and the condition of which he complains. Bedford Belt R. Co. v. Brown (1895) 142 Ind. 659, 42 N. E. 359.

The rule which requires the master to provide a safe place and safe appliances for the servant is applied when the place in which the work is to be done is furnished or prepared by the master, as in the case of a ship or a mill or a factory, or when the machinery or other appliances with which the servant is employed to work are furnished by the master; but it has no application when the place at which the work is to be done, or the appliances for doing the same, are to be prepared by the servant himself. If the appliance is furnished by the master for the purpose of enabling the servants to perform the work in which they are to be engaged, he is required to see that it shall be reasonably safe for that purpose; but if the preparation of that appliance is a part of the work which the servant is required to perform, the master is not liable for any defect in its preparation. The rule does not apply to a case where several persons are employed to do certain work, and, by the contract of employment, either express or implied, the employees are to adjust the appliances by which the work is to be done. Callan v. Bull (1896) 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017.

Where the master does not undertake the duty of furnishing or adapting the appliances by which the work is to be performed, but this duty is intrusted to or assumed by the workmen themselves, within the scope of their employment, he is exempt from responsibility if suitable materials are furnished and suitable workmen are employed by him, even if they negligently do that which they thus undertake. Kelley v. Norcross (1877) 121 Mass. 508.

1. Application of the rule in the case of scaffolds, stagings, etc.

The earliest reported case turning upon the liability of a master for a defective scaffold is Wigmore v. Jay (1850) 5 Exch. 354, 14 Jur. 837, 19 L. J. Exch. N. S. 300. There the plaintiff's husband was one of the brick layers employed by the defendant for that purpose. The scaffold was erected under the superintendence of the defendant's foreman, the defendant not being present, and was constructed by men in the employ of the defendant, who used an unsound ledger, in consequence of which the scaffold broke while the plaintiff's husband was at work upon it. The unsoundness of the pole had been previously pointed out to the foreman, but the deceased could not see its defect on account of some planks being laid across it. Recovery was denied on the grounds that the defendant had not personally superintended the erection of the structure, and that his foreman was a fellow servant of the plaintiff's intestate, and not shown to have been a person deficient in skill, or an improper person to be employed for that purpose. The main contention of plaintiff's counsel was that Priestley v. Fowler (1837) 3 Mees. & W. 1, Murph. & H. 305, 1 Jur. 987, had no application for the reason that the persons erecting a scaffold are not fellow laborers of a man who is merely employed to work thereon, and the case followed was Hutchinson v. York, N. & R. R. Co. (1850) 5 Exch. 343, 19 L. J. Exch. N. S. 296, 14 Jur. 837, where the plaintiff was traveling on a train and the delinquents were the trainmen. The actual decision thus rendered is quite in harmony with the more recent authorities, but it will become clear as we proceed with the review of the cases cited in this and the next subdivisions that the tests at present applied for the purpose of determining the right of the servant to maintain his action are in some important respects different from those referred to by the English judges.

The doctrine which is now regarded as defining the nature and extent of the master's responsibility under such circumstances as those involved in Wigmore v. Jay is that which is set forth in the following extracts:

Where the servant is injured by defects in a temporary staging intended to be used only in finishing the building where it was constructed, "if the plaintiff's employers furnished sufficient quantities of suitable materials for staging, employed suitable workmen, and did not themselves undertake the duty of furnishing the staging as a structure, but only of supplying materials and labor by which it might be built and from time to time adapted to the work; and if the duty of furnishing or adapting the staging as an appliance for use in the work of finishing the room was intrusted to, or assumed by, the workmen themselves, within the scope of their employment,—the employers are not answerable to the plaintiff for his injury.

On the other hand, if the staging was furnished by the employers as a completed structure, or if they themselves supervised and directed its construction, or if, relying upon its construction by their workmen for themselves, the employers negligently failed to provide suitable and sufficient materials, or negligently hired incompetent workmen, the employers might be answerable to the plaintiff." Brady v. Norcross (1899) 172 Mass. 331, 52 N. E. 528.

It was not enough to prove that the scaffolding gave way under the circumstances resulting in an accident, or that it was in fact defective, unless it was made to appear that this was the proximate result of some omission of duty on the part of the defendants or their foreman. If they furnished suitable materials for the construction of a proper platform, and the workmen themselves constructed it according to their own judgment, the defendants were not liable for the manner in which they used the material so furnished. Kimmer v. Weber (1897) 151 N. Y. 417, 45 N. E. 860.

Where an employer employs mechanics to do a certain amount of work, the doing of which requires the use of scaffolds which it is a part of the work of the mechanics so employed to construct, and the employer furnishes proper materials with which to construct the scaffolds, the master is not liable for the negligent use of such materials, either by improperly uniting them together, or by selecting materials not proper for the particular use for which they are selected, whereby one of such mechanics is injured, as the accident was not the result of the neglect of a duty that a master owed to his employees; and to establish a cause of action for such an injury, the plaintiff must prove, in addition to the fact that there was negligence in the selection of the materials for the building of the scaffold, the additional fact that the master, or some one that stood in the relation of representative of the master, assumed to construct the scaffold, and then directed the employers to use it as a constructed scaffold.

Where an employer employs men to do particular work, furnishing them with a completed scaffold as an appliance with which to do the work, if that completed scaffold is an unsafe or an improper appliance for the purpose for which it is to be used, there is a violation of the duty imposed upon the employer to furnish his employees proper appliances with which to do the work. Where, however, the employee, as a part of the work that he is to do, is to construct the scaffold out of the materials furnished by the employer, and the employer furnishes proper materials for that purpose, and such employee, either by negligence in putting the materials together or in selecting the materials, erects an unsafe appliance, which results in injury to one of those employed to do the work, the neglect is not that of the employer. McCone v. Gallagher (1897) 16 App. Div. 272, 41 N. Y. Supp. 697.

If the plaintiff and his coemployees had, without specific instruction from the master, or one acting for the master and under his authority in the performance of the duty which he owed to his employees, constructed a scaffold of improper material, it would undoubtedly be a case where the negligence was that of a fellow employee or co-servant with the plaintiff, for which the master would not be liable. Richards v. Hayes (1897) 17 App. Div. 422, 45 N. Y. Supp. 234.

Where the master employs competent workmen, and provides suitable materials for the necessary staging to be used by them, and intrusts the duty of erecting it to them as a part of the work which they are engaged to perform, he is not liable to one of them for injuries resulting to him from the falling of the staging. Jones v. St. Louis, N. & P. Packet Co. (1891) 43 Mo. App. 398.

For an injury received by one workman from the negligence of others in increasing the scaffold's height, the employer would be no more liable than he would be for the fall of a ladder furnished by him to his workmen, when the fall was the result of its being negligently placed insecurely by one of them. Maher v. McGrath (1896) 58 N. J. L. 409, 33 Atl. 945.

With respect to the building of ordinary scaffoldings and other simple structures of that nature which laborers and mechanics are in the habit of constructing for themselves, the master is under no obligation to do more than to supply a sufficient quantity of material which is reasonably well adapted for the making of such structures. Kerr-Murray Mfg. Co. v. Hess (1899) 38 C. C. A. 647, 98 Fed. 56.

In Hopkin v. Worcester (1885) 140 Mass. 222, 2 N. E. 779, a city employed a master builder to furnish labor and tools required in the erection of a building by the city highway commissioner. The city furnished the materials necessary and paid the bullder and his men. A directed B, one of his men, to erect a staging; and the man used a defective bracket belonging to A, whereby one of A's workmen was injured. It was held that, the master bullder not having had any authority from the city to furnish the bracket except an implied permission to use it under his contract, the negligence was that of servants in constructing unsafe staging, and not that of a master in not furnishing proper materials.

Other cases in which the principles thus set forth have been held to prevent the injured servant from recovering are the following: Noyes v. Wood (1894) 102 Cal. 389, 36 Pac. 766; Perigo v. Indianapolis Brewing Co. (1899) 21 Ind. App. 338, 52 N. E. 462 (injury caused by the removal of the supports by a fellow servant, plaintiff having notice of what was going on); Kennedy v. Spring (1893) 160 Mass. 203, 35 N. E. 770 (mason's "tender" injured by negligence of mason in selecting improper materials, or in improperly fastening them); Oelschlegel v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. (1898) 73 Minn. 327, 76 N. W. 56, 409 (negligent selection of plank for temporary scaffold); Marsh v. Herman (1891) 47 Minn. 537, 50 N. W. 611; Beesley v. F. W. Wheeler & Co. (1894) 103 Mich. 196, 27 L. R. A. 260, 61 N. W. 658 (riveter and carpenter under the same superintendent engaged in ship building held to be fellow servants, so as to preclude recovery by the riveter for injuries caused by negligence of the carpenters in constructing a scaffold on which he works); Olsen v. Nixon (1898) 61 N. J. L. 671, 40 Atl. 604 (part of work—no undertaking to furnish—ship carpenter injured); Judson v. Olean (1889) 116 N. Y. 635, 22 N. E. 535, Reversing (1886) 41 Hun, 637; Butler v. Townsend (1891) 126 N. Y. 105, 26 N. E. 1017, Reversing 32 N. Y. S. R. 1055, 10 N. Y. Supp. 809; Hogan v. Smith (1891) 125 N. Y. 774, 26 N. E. 742; Donnelly v. Brown (1887) 43 Hun, 470 (foot of ladder used for supporting a scaffold was insecurely placed); Hogan v. Field (1887) 4 Hun. 72; McCormack v. Crawford (1886) 4 N. Y. S. R. 935; Thompson v. Libbey (1892) 46 N. Y. S. R. 324, 10 N. Y. Supp. 680; Stutz v. Armour (1893) 84 Wis. 623, 54 N. W. 1000 (foreman directed plaintiff to adjust a plank in a scaffold); Cadden v. American Steel Barge Co. (1894) 88 Wis. 409, 60 N. W. 800.

Other cases applying the same doctrine in one or more of its various phases are cited in the next three subdivisions.

Both on the ground relied upon in these cases, and also on the ground of the unauthorized use of the appliance, a contractor who provides a sufficient scaffold for his work is not liable for the death of an employee from the giving way of an insufficient scaffold constructed for the use of another contractor's employees, and not adopted by him for the use of his workmen, upon which such workman goes in the performance of his work. Mauer v. Ferguson (1892) 44 N. Y. S. R. 372, 17 N. Y. Supp. 349.

2. Application of the rule in the case of other instrumentalities.

A railway contractor is not liable for defects in a trestle which is not a structure furnished for employees to work on, but is itself a part of the work which they are engaged to perform, and is a thing which they themselves make, and "as much a part of the construction of the road as was digging in the pit, loading cars, driving teams, or tampling dirt on the dump." Lindvall v. Woods (1889) 41 Minn. 212, 4 L. R. A. 793, 42 N. W. 1020.

The making of the projecting steps in a pile of lumber being a part of the work which the men in the yard are hired to perform, none of them, whether pilers, sorters, or measurers, can recover for injuries caused by the selection of a knotty plank for one of the steps. Fraser v. Red River Lumber Co. (1890) 42 Minn. 520, 44 N. W. 878 (1891) 45 Minn. 235, 47 N. W. 785.

A master is not liable for injury to a servant, caused by the fall of a heavy pump, due to the giving way of an eyebolt insecurely fastened in the ceiling by a fellow servant for the purpose of raising such pump. Watts v. Beard (1897) 18 App. Div. 243, 45 N. Y. Supp. 873. The court said: "There is no question about the competency of the plaintiff's coemployees, nor of the strength and sufficiency of the eyebolt. The difficulty arose from the failure to securely fasten it in the ceiling for the purpose designed. If this preparation for the work of hoisting the pump was within the duties of the defendants, then whoever did it represented them, and the negligence was theirs. This is the contention of the plaintiff's counsel, by whom it is insisted that they failed to use the care required of them to afford to the plaintiff a safe place for his work. When the men commenced the performance of the work of adjustment of the pump there was no want of safety in the situation, or in the existing conditions, at the place where this was to be done, nor was there any defect in the appliances employed in the work. The accident arose from the failure to make such use of them as to give safety to its performance. It is not important to inquire whether the failure of the eyebolt to retain its place in the ceiling was attributable to the use of a larger sized bit than should have been used, or to an unsubstantial condition at the place in the wooden ceiling where the hole was made for it. The eyebolt was not designed as a permanent attachment to the ceiling, or for subsequent use in the business of the defendants. It was adopted as a temporary expedient for the occasion,—employed as a means to accomplish the purpose then in view, and the use made of it was within the details of the work which the workmen were proceeding to perform. In that view any negligence to which the plaintiff's injury may have been attributable was not that of the defendants, but was that of his coemployees."

A member of a bridge gang cannot recover for injuries caused by the fact that a wedge used in constructing a temporary track for the conveyance of materials slipped out of place. Bedford Belt R. Co. v. Brown (1895) 142 Ind. 659, 42 N. E. 350.

The breaking of a defective plank used as a bridge to transport articles from a car to a shed will not render the master liable where the plank was apparently sound and selected by a fellow servant of the plaintiff. Van den Heuvel v. National Furnace Co. (1893) 84 Wis. 636, 54 N. W. 1010.

An employer is not liable for defects in a "trussed plank," a temporary contrivance constructed out of materials selected by the workmen themselves while fitting a roof on a building. Keystone Bridge Co. v. Newberry (1881) 96 Pa. 246, 42 Am. Rep. 543 (plank gave way while a rafter was being carried across it).

Compare with these decisions the cases cited in VI. c. supra.

e. Rationale and limits of a master's exemption from liability for the adjustment or preparation of instrumentalities.

The limits of a master's liability for an injury caused by a scaffold or other appliance constructed or adjusted as a part of the work are determined upon the hypothesis that it is his duty, in the alternative, "to furnish either a suitable platform or scaffold for doing the work that the plaintiff and his employees were required to do, or proper and suitable materials for the construction of such a platform." Richards v. Hayes (1897) 17 App. Div. 422, 45 N. Y. Supp. 234; s. p., McCone v. Gallagher (1897) 16 App. Div. 272, 44 N. Y. Supp. 697.

Under the general principle stated in IV. j, supra, the question whether the one or the other of these duties was chargeable to the master is primarily one for the jury under proper instructions. Donnelly v. Booth Bros. & H. I. Granite Co. (1897) 90 Me. 110, 37 Atl. 874 (negligence here was in the erection and support of a run for large stones, and in the selection of the gear), Citing Arkerson v. Dennison (1875) 117 Mass. 407, where the general rule was laid down as follows: "When the preparation of the appliances is neither intrusted to, nor assumed by, them, the master may be held guilty of negligence if defective appliances are furnished, even though the workmen themselves are employed in the preparation of them. In such case, negligence appearing, it is a question of fact for the jury whether that negligence was in respect of what was done or undertaken by the fellow workmen, or was the negligence of the master."

So far as regards the control or review of the conclusions of a jury, the essential matter for the consideration of a court is the effect of the evidence as indicating the relation which the servant responsible for the defects in the instrumentality bore to the plaintiff and the defendant in directing the work which resulted in the production of that instrumentality, or in providing the materials of which it was to be constructed. Richards v. Hayes (1897) 17 App. Div. 422, 45 N. Y. Supp. 234.

What that relation is may, as an analysis of the cases shows, be determined by following either one of two lines of investigation, to each of which certain logical conceptions are peculiarly appropriate. For the sake of clearness, therefore, it will be well to differentiate between the alternative theories of the evidence which is customarily presented in cases of this class, though at the same time it should be remarked that the interval between them is so easily bridged that the courts quite commonly pass from one to the other in the course of the same opinion. The starting point of one of the lines of investigation may be said to be the question whether the construction or adjustment of the defective instrumentality was a function which the master was justified in leaving to the servants themselves. Thus, to take the most numerous group of cases under this head for the purposes of illustrations: The mere fact that a staging was not built under the immediate personal supervision of the master is manifestly not sufficient to justify a trial judge in ruling, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff cannot recover. The omission to exercise such supervision may itself have been negligent. Arkerson v. Dennison (1875) 117 Mass. 407. There the plaintiff by direction of his employer went onto a staging which, being either constructed of unsuitable materials, or insufficiently fastened together, was insecure, and which was built before the plaintiff began work, by persons who were afterwards his fellow workmen, the defendant directing what lumber was to be used therefor, and, although the staging was not built under his direct personal supervision, superintending the work generally. The court said: "Whether a particular structure or appliance is one for which the master is responsible to his servant may depend upon circumstances including the nature and scope of the employment of those engaged in its preparation and use. It may depend upon the question whether the direction and charge of the work is confided to the workmen or some of them, or retained by the employer or left unprovided for. If the employer directs his workmen to do certain work, leaving it to them to provide the structures and appliances required for its prosecution, he may be responsible only for care in selection of the men and material assigned for it. But if he simply employs them to work under his direction, giving them no charge or responsibility in regard to the result to be accomplished or the appliances to be used, that responsibility remains with him. The negligence of fellow workmen for which the master is held to be exempt from responsibility is negligence in respect to that which the workmen undertook or were set to do. . . . It would have been competent for the jury to find that the defendant had not intrusted the preparation of the staging to anyone else, and therefore that he retained the charge and direction of it himself, and was bound to exercise some degree of care in regard to it, which he neglected to do."

When the selection of materials or construction of the appliances to the business is such that it may properly be left to the workmen, in their capacity as workmen, and within the scope of their employment, and it is so left by the master, he is relieved from responsibility for their negligence. Donnelly v. Booth Bros. & H. I. Granite Co. (1897) 90 Me. 110, 37 Atl. 874.

The liability of the master cannot be determined merely by showing that the place where the workmen were engaged in his service was a scaffold; but it must depend upon the nature of the scaffold and the purposes it is to subserve,—whether it could be properly left to the workmen to determine and control the method of its erection, and whether they did in fact control its erection, or whether the master had charge thereof. F. C. Austin Mfg. Co. v. Johnson (1898) 32 C. C. A. 309, 60 U. S. App. 661, 89 Fed. 677. See further, as to this case, VI. g, 2, infra.

Another case recognizing the principle in the text is O'Connor v. Rich (1895) 164 Mass. 560, 42 N. E. 111, where the same principle is conceded arguendo.

That the delegation of the function was not culpable is sometimes inferred from positive evidence showing that such workmen as those in question generally construct their own scaffolds and adjust their own appliances.

In Kimmer v. Weber (1897) 151 N. Y. 417, 45 N. E. 860, the court remarked that "when a gang of masons are engaged in plastering or painting a room, the construction of proper platforms or places upon which to stand while doing the work is one of the details of the business that is generally left to the workmen themselves."

In McCone v. Gallagher (1897) 16 App. Div. 272, 44 N. Y. Supp. 697, one of the evidential factors enumerated was that it was "customary" for carpenters employed to do the particular kind of work in question to construct the necessary scaffold. See also Noyes v. Wood (1894) 102 Cal. 389, 36 Pac. 766, where the same conception is adverted to.

But specific testimony of such a custom is not necessary to negative fault in this regard. The virtual effect of the authorities is that whenever the defective scaffold or other appliance was essentially one of a temporary character, constructed or adjusted with a view to some particular piece of work, the master cannot be held negligent merely for the reason that he left such construction or adjustment to the servants themselves.

In a recent case it was observed that the courts draw a distinction between a scaffold which is a permanent platform furnished by the employer on which he invites his workmen to stand in doing their work, and a temporary and movable platform to be increased in height as the work progresses by the workmen themselves as their needs require. Maher v. McGrath (1896) 58 N. J. L. 469, 38 Atl. 945, Contrasting Mulchey v. Methodist Religious Soc. (1878) 123 Mass. 487.

In McCone v. Gallagher (1897) 16 App. Div. 272, 44 N. Y. Supp. 697, it was considered that the cases containing the latest expressions of opinion of the court of appeals established this principle: "Where an employer employs mechanics to do a certain amount of work, the doing of which requires the use of scaffolds which it is a part of the work of the mechanics so employed to construct, and the employer furnishes proper materials with which to construct the scaffolds, for the negligent use of such materials, either by improperly uniting them together or by selecting materials not proper for the particular use for which they are selected, whereby one of such mechanics is injured, as the accident was not the result of the neglect of a duty that the master owed to his employees, the master is not liable."

A servant cannot recover for injuries caused by the fall of a scaffold, where the evidence is merely that a rope which should have secured a spar slipped or became untied. Pickett v. Atlas S. S. Co. (1884) 12 Daly, 441. (Compare also the rulings cited in the following paragraphs.) In other words, whenever the instrumentality is one of this character the burden of proof lies on the servant to overcome the presumption of non-culpability by adducing some positive evidence from which an obligation on the master's part to furnish such instrumentality in a completed state is reasonably inferable. See, for example, Kimmer v. Weber (1897) 151 N. Y. 417, 45 N. E. 860, where one of the grounds on which it was held that the plaintiff failed to make out a case for the consideration of the jury was that he had not shown that it was the duty of the master, under the circumstances, to construct the platform on which the masons were to do the work, but that, on the contrary, the proof showed that this duty was assumed by the workmen as one of the details of the work.

On the other hand, it is also clear, both upon principle and authority, that the fact of an appliance being ordinarily prepared by the plaintiff's fellow servants is not necessarily a bar to the action. Since the duty to furnish safe appliances rests upon the master, he must discharge his duty in the premises. Negligence, however often repeated, will not ripen into an excuse for neglect from which injury results. Donnelly v. Booth Bros. & H. I. Granite Co. (1897) 90 Me. 110, 37 Atl. 874.

It will be observed that the theory upon which recovery is, from this standpoint, permitted or denied, is simply that, as there is no culpability on the master's part, the general principle is left to operate that in selecting and using the materials the workmen act as each other's fellow servants.

In Ross v. Walker (1891) 139 Pa. 42, 21 Atl. 157, 159, where the action was held not to be maintainable for an injury caused by a defective false work, the court said: "It is not material to this inquiry to know whether 'Duffey had entire charge and control of the work' as a foreman or not; nor to know whether he selected from the mass furnished by the employer the materials to be used for any particular purpose or not; nor whether he hired and discharged men or not. The inquiry is, Was it the employer's duty, after having provided materials ample in quantity and quality, to supervise the selection of every stick out of the mass for every purpose? To state this question is to answer it. This was not his duty, and for 54 L. R. A.

that reason Duffey, if he did select the timber, which is more than doubtful under the testimony, did not represent Walker as a vice principal in such selection. He and his fellow workmen were to judge of the suitability of the pieces of timber they used for the uses to which they put them, and their error in judgment, or their careless discharge of this duty, was their fault or failure, and not that of their employer. He had discharged his duty when he furnished an abundance of materials from which they could select what was needed. The actual selection out of this stock of the sticks needed from time to time was not his duty, but that of the workmen themselves. If there was a visible defect in a stick, common prudence and common care on their part would have rejected it and supplied its place with another out of the stock at their command." It was held error to have refused to instruct the jury that, if they found the defendant put the work in charge of a competent foreman, and provided suitable materials for the scaffolding in sufficient quantity, then he was guilty of no negligence, and the verdict must be in his favor. See also the language used in Keystone Bridge Co. v. Newberry (1881) 96 Pa. 246, 42 Am. Rep. 543.

The essential question to be determined, if we choose the alternative line of investigation, is whether the master, as a matter of fact, assumed to furnish the scaffold or other instrumentality in a completed form, or left it to be prepared by the servants themselves.

In one of the cases already cited it was laid down that, generally, "to establish a cause of action for such an injury, plaintiff must prove, in addition to the fact that there was negligence in the selection of the materials for the building of the scaffold, the additional fact that the master, or someone who stood in the relation of representative of the master, assumed to construct the scaffold, and then directed the employees to use it as a constructed scaffold." McCone v. Gallagher (1897) 16 App. Div. 272, 44 N. Y. Supp. 697.

Clearly, if such assumption is established, the master will be liable, as for negligence, even if the circumstances were otherwise such that he would have been justified in leaving the servants to prepare the defective instrumentality themselves. Kimmer v. Weber (1897) 151 N. Y. 417, 45 N. E. 860 (where, however, the action was held not to be maintainable for the reason that there was no evidence that the defendants actually constructed, or directed the construction of, the platform which gave way); Adasken v. Gilbert (1896) 165 Mass. 443, 43 N. E. 199; Brady v. Norcross (1899) 172 Mass. 331, 52 N. E. 528.

Where an employer employs men to do particular work, furnishing them with a completed scaffold as an appliance with which to do the work, if that completed scaffold is an unsafe or an improper appliance for the purpose for which it is to be used, there is a violation of the duty imposed upon the employer to furnish his employees proper appliances with which to do the work. McCone v. Gallagher (1897) 16 App. Div. 272, 44 N. Y. Supp. 697.

In Miller v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1891) 109 Mo. 356, 19 S. W. 58, the court said: "Cases often arise where the master becomes liable by reason of the fact that he undertakes by himself, or through a representative, to do certain things which might have been left to the servant to perform. Thus, where the master provides suitable materials for a staging, and intrusts the duty of erecting the structure to the workmen as a part of the work which they undertake to perform, he is not liable for injuries resulting to one of them from the falling of the staging; but, if the master undertakes to furnish the stage, he must use due care in its erection, and, if there is negligence on his part or on the part of one representing him in that regard, he is liable for injuries resulting to the servant using the structure."

The case is for the jury where the evidence is conflicting, or reasonably consistent, either with the hypothesis that the defective appliance was constructed by the fellow servants of the injured person out of materials furnished by the master, or with the hypothesis that it was constructed under the direction of the defendant or his representative. Bryer v. Foerster (1896) 9 App. Div. 542, 41 N. Y. Supp. 617. See, generally, IV. j. supra.

The instructions proper to be given for the guidance of a jury were very elaborately discussed in Colton v. Richards (1878) 123 Mass. 484. There the evidence tended to show that the staging was erected by fellow workmen of the plaintiff, out of material furnished by the defendant; that the staging was insecure by reason of a small piece of defective timber, called a putlog, on which the floor of the staging rested, and which had been in use by the defendant about two years; that the material for the staging was lying on the ground in piles near the building, and, from the mass, persons, who were afterwards the fellow workmen of the plaintiff, selected such material as they wanted, including the putlog in question; that some of the workmen were journeymen, whose trade it was to learn to build safe and proper staging, and that they superintended the erection of this staging. The plaintiff asked the judge to instruct the jury as follows: "1. It is the duty of an employer to provide reasonably safe and proper material and implements for his workmen to work with and use, and his failure so to do is negligence. 2. If it was the duty of the defendant to provide for the plaintiff a completed staging as a structure, as an implement or appliance to carry on this work, then he was bound to see that the staging was a reasonably safe and strong one, and suitable to the work required of the plaintiff, and the fact that fellow workmen of the plaintiff used poor material furnished by the defendant, in the erection of such staging, is no defense. 3. If the putlog was a manufactured and completed implement or utensil, and was furnished by the defendant for the plaintiff's use, he is liable, even though it was put in use by the act of the plaintiff's fellow workmen." The judge refused to give these instructions, and instructed the jury that the plaintiff could not recover, unless they were satisfied that the defendant did not exercise ordinary care in the selection of men and materials to erect the staging, and that such want of ordinary care caused the accident; and that, if the defendant was to furnish a staging as a completed structure, he was to use such care in so doing as any person of ordinary prudence would use in providing such a structure; and that, if he was only to furnish material, he was to use ordinary care in the selection of material; that if he was to furnish this putlog as a manufacturer's utensil, he was to use ordinary care in so doing. In the substitution of these instructions for those requested there was held to be no error, and that the jury must have found, either that the defendant did not assume the alleged duty in any of the forms suggested, or that the duty, whatever it was, was faithfully performed. There being evidence in the same case, which the defendant contended showed that he did not superintend the erection of the staging, the judge also instructed the jury, at the defendant's request, as follows: "1. If the defendant employed competent men to take charge of the erection of this building and of the necessary staging, and furnished suitable material for building the staging, out of which material a fellow workman, not under the superintendence of the defendant or his agent, selected a defective putlog which broke after the staging was erected, by which the plaintiff was injured, the defendant was not liable. 2. The defendant is not liable if he used ordinary care and prudence in the selection of competent workmen and materials, from which this staging was made." After these instructions had been given, the court, at the defendant's request, further ruled, in substance, that if the defendant employed competent men to take charge of the erection of this building and of the staging necessary, and furnished suitable material therefor, he would not be liable, if a fellow workman, not under the superintendence of the defendant or his agent, selected a defective putlog, by the breaking of which the plaintiff was injured; and added that the defendant would not be liable if he used ordinary care and prudence in the selection of competent workmen and materials from which the staging was made. It was objected by the plaintiff that this last and additional sentence does not state the full measure of the defendant's duty, when, as master, he takes upon himself the business of furnishing a completed staging for the use of his workmen. The court said: "In such case, it may indeed be true that the exercise of due care in selecting men and materials will not always satisfy the obligation assumed. It may still be his duty, especially when he superintends the work himself, to see that the completed structure is in itself reasonably safe and fit for the uses to which it is devoted. But this last statement appears to have been only intended to apply to a case where the duty of the master did not include the building of the staging, but ended with the supply of materials. The judge has just told the jury that, if the defendant was to furnish a completed staging, he was bound to use such care as a person of ordinary prudence would use in providing such a structure. This was sufficiently definite in the absence of any request for more specific instructions. The plaintiff relied on the defendant's neglect of duty in several forms, as we have seen, and the instructions asked by the defendant, taken together, imply that they all refer only to that which related to the supply of suitable material for the work. They expressly refer in terms to the case where the plaintiff and his fellow workmen are employed to take charge, not only of the erection of the building, but of the necessary staging also, and where the defective timber is selected by a fellow workman, not working under the superintendence of the defendant or his agent. As applied to such a case, all parts of the instructions given at the defendant's request are correct and consistent; and the plaintiff's objection is not well taken."

f. Special circumstances not affecting the extent of the master's liability.

As to the effect of an express undertaking on the master's part to furnish an appliance the construction of which he might have left to the servants, see the preceding subdivision.

1. Superior rank of the delinquent employee.

It would seem that inferences unfavorable to the defendant will more readily be drawn where the delinquent coservant was in a position of control which normally left him free to arrange the details of the work at his own discretion without any interference on the master's part.

In Woods v. Lindvall (1891) 1 C. C. A. 37, 4 U. S. App. 49, 48 Fed. 62, a contractor for railway construction was held liable for defects in a trestle erected by his superintendent for the purpose of the work. The court said, speaking of his official: "He had authority to direct all the men on that section, between thirty and forty in number, when to work, where to work, and how to work, and it was their duty to obey his orders. He superintended and supervised all the work on the section, and hired and discharged workmen at his discretion. In these respects he was invested with all the power and authority his principals possessed. He did not ordinarily do manual labor; his chief duty was to supervise personally the work, including the building of the trestle, and to give directions how all parts of the same should be done. He went back and forth between the places where the different crews were at work on the section, directing and instructing, and occasionally assisting each of them in the work they were doing. Johnson, who framed the bents and put up the trestle, worked in obedience to his orders, as well as the other men. As the plaintiffs assumed through Murdock the superintendence and control of the construction of the trestle, they were bound to exercise ordinary care to make it reasonably safe and secure for those called to do work upon it. In the discharge of this duty Murdock occupied the place of the plaintiffs in error, and any failure on his part to exercise ordinary care in the discharge of this duty is imputable to them. Whether the trestle was one of those structures the building of which the master might have committed to ordinary fellow laborers, without any instructions or superintending care, by simply providing them with adequate materials and tools to do the work, need not be discussed. The plaintiffs in error did not attempt to build the trestle in any such way. They did not leave the mode and manner of its construction to the discretion or judgment of the laborers doing the work, but they constituted Murdock their representative, and imposed on him the duty, and conferred on him the authority, to supervise, direct, and control its construction, and required the laborers to obey his orders and directions in the premises. Under these relations Murdock did not sustain the relation of a fellow servant to the defendant in error in respect to this work. He stood in the shoes of his employers, and was their representative, and they are responsible for the results of his negligence in the work so committed to his direction, supervision, and control."

In Blomquist v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1895) 60 Minn. 426, 62 N. W. 818, it was held that a foreman of a crew of stone masons, with power to hire and discharge the workmen, is a vice principal in respect to a common laborer aiding the masons, who is injured by the negligent manner in which a derrick is constructed, when the foreman directs where and how it shall be built. The case was distinguished from Lindvall v. Woods (1889) 41 Minn. 212, 4 L. R. A. 798, 42 N. W. 1020, on the ground that the place, the plan, and the manner of putting up the appliance had been especially and unconditionally delegated to the foreman (Canty, J., dissented).

The case here cited was a decision upon the same facts as Woods v. Lindvall (1891) 1 C. C. 37, 4 U. S. App. 49, 48 Fed. 62, supra, and placed the supreme court of Minnesota in conflict with the circuit court of appeals.

But it is clear from the decisions that, if the rest of the facts show that the work of construction was intrusted to the servants as part of their duties, the mere fact that the delinquent employee was a foreman, exercising some control over the injured person, is not sufficient to show that the master assumed to furnish the servants with such a structure as was necessary to do the work. See Kimmer v. Weber (1897) 151 N. Y. 417, 45 N. E. 860; McCons v. 64 L. R. A.

Gallagher (1897) 16 App. Div. 272, 44 N. Y. Supp. 697.

In Killea v. Faxon (1878) 125 Mass. 485, the defendant employed a carpenter to superintend the entire job of repairing a building, and directed him to erect a staging, which was solely for putting on the gutters. In doing so, he insecurely fastened the brackets to the building. On the next day the defendant ordered copper gutters of a coppersmith, and directed him to send a man to put them on. This man was sent accordingly, and was directed by the carpenter where to go on the staging, which fell and injured him. The court said: "There was no evidence which would justify the jury in finding that either of the defendants undertook to furnish a staging for the plaintiff, or to assume the risk of its safety. It was like the ordinary case where a man, in building or repairing a house, employs various servants in different departments of labor. Neither of the defendants retained any charge or direction of the work of putting up the staging, but intrusted it to Higgins. He and the plaintiff were fellow servants employed in the same service, and each took the risk of the negligence of the other. It is not contended that there was any evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants in the employment of Higgins, it appearing that he was a skilful and competent carpenter. It follows that the plaintiff has proved no negligence for which the defendants, or either of them, are responsible."

2. Similarity or dissimilarity of the work in which the delinquent and injured servants were engaged.

In many of the cases belonging to this category the court has laid more or less stress upon the fact that the plaintiff himself was one of that particular set or group of servants to whom the construction of the defective instrumentality was intrusted. Colton v. Richards (1878) 123 Mass. 484; Kelley v. Norcross (1877) 121 Mass. 508; Adasken v. Gilbert (1896) 165 Mass. 443, 43 N. E. 199; Moore v. McNeill (1898) 35 App. Div. 323, 54 N. Y. Supp. 956; Whallon v. Sprague Electric Elevator Co. (1896) 1 App. Div. 264, 37 N. Y. Supp. 174; Noyes v. Wood (1894) 102 Cal. 389, 36 Pac. 766; Maher v. McGrath (1896) 58 N. J. L. 469, 33 Atl. 945 (master not liable to a hod carrier for an injury from the negligent manner in which masons constructed a scaffolding); Crawford v. Stewart (1886; Pa.) 6 Cent. Rep. 140, 8 Atl. 5; Stutz v. Armour (1893) 84 Wis. 623, 54 N. W. 1000; Callan v. Bull (1896) 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017; Donnelly v. Booth Bros. & H. I. Granite Co. (1897) 90 Me. 110, 37 Atl. 874; Willis v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. (1884) 11 Or. 257, 4 Pac. 121.

If the plaintiff and his coemployees, without specific instruction from the master, or one acting for the master and under his authority in the performance of the duty which he owed to his employees, constructed a scaffold of improper material, it would undoubtedly be a case where the negligence was that of a fellow servant or co-servant with the plaintiff, for which the master would not be liable. Richards v. Hayes (1897) 17 App. Div. 422, 45 N. Y. Supp. 234.

It is undoubtedly under such circumstances that the rule operates with the least harshness, especially if the injured person was himself an expert as regards the construction of the appliance which proved defective. See, for example, Hopkin v. Worcester (1885) 140 Mass. 222, 2 N. E. 779; Vincent v. Mauststock (1898) 30 App. Div. 308, 51 N. Y. Supp. 494; McCone v. Gallagher (1897) 16 App. Div. 272, 44 N. Y.

Supp. 697; Griffiths v. New Jersey & N. Y. R. Co. (1894) 8 Misc. 3, 28 N. Y. Supp. 75, Affirming (1893) 5 Misc. 320, 26 N. Y. Supp. 812; Perigo v. Indianapolis Brewing Co. (1899) 21 Ind. App. 338, 52 N. E. 462, where the plaintiffs and their fellow servants were all carpenters, and had erected or modified the scaffold which fell.

In some states of the evidence such a situation may even render the defense of contributory negligence available to the master. It has been laid down that, where the workmen of whom the plaintiff is one, although the construction of the appliance is no part of their business, undertake, without objection, to construct it, and do this so carelessly that it is insecure, the plaintiff is considered to be debarred from recovery on the ground that he, as well as his co-laborers, is guilty of negligence. Hogan v. Field (1887) 44 Hun, 72.

But it may now be taken as settled law that the mere fact that the injured and negligent persons were not doing the same kind of work is not, of itself, a sufficient ground for predicating a right of recovery.

In Beesley v. F. W. Wheeler & Co. (1894) 103 Mich. 196, 27 L. R. A. 266, 61 N. W. 638, it was held that riveters working on a ship could not recover for the negligence of the carpenters in constructing a scaffold. The court reasoned thus: "Here the defendant was engaged in the enterprise of building a ship. Artisans of various kinds were employed to do their respective shares of the work. The building of stagings, the erection of derricks, and the raising of materials were parts of the necessary work, incident to and simultaneous with, and in fact a part of, the building of the ship. Stagings were for temporary use, and indispensable. All was under the charge of one superintendent, who directed the different gangs through their respective foreman. There is nothing to indicate a contract to provide a safe scaffold to work upon, or an assumption of that duty by the master, and the case seems to be clearly within the rule of Killea v. Faxon (1878) 125 Mass. 485, which it closely resembles, and of Hoar v. Merritt (1886) 62 Mich. 386, 29 N. W. 15. [See below.] The duty was one which was left to those engaged in the construction of the ship. It is believed that this does no violence to the rule of safe place. The case is different from those where the master furnishes a permanent place to work, as in a ship or factory. A master's duty in such a case is to make and keep the place reasonably safe; but that rule would apply as to those working in, but not necessarily as to those constructing, the factory. Such employees would not be fellow servants with each other, for the enterprises would not be the same. The service of one would be the erection of the completed factory; that of the other its use for the purpose for which it was designed. But here the scaffold builder and the riveter are engaged in the common service of building a ship. The work of both goes along together, and it seems to us that the case is clearly within the rule of Priestley v. Fowler (1837) 3 Mees. & W. 1, Murph. & H. 305, 1 Jur. 987, and kindred cases."

See also Killea v. Faxon (1878) 125 Mass. 485, cited in VI. f, 1, supra.
So, a lumber company is not liable where a knotty plank, negligently selected by a servant piling lumber to serve as a step for persons having occasion to mount the pile, gives way under a scaler and measurer. Fraser v. Red River Lumber Co. (1891) 45 Minn. 235, 47 N. W. 785.
Nor is any larger measure of liability imposed on the master merely for the reason that the appliance which proved defective had been constructed by another set of servants for their own use, and afterwards incorporated with the appliance which the injured servant and his co-laborers constructed for their own purposes. Kimmer v. Weber (1897) 151 N. Y. 417, 45 N. E. 960. Compare subdivision 3, infra.

The action has been held not maintainable where a scaffold carelessly constructed by carpenters for their own use from suitable materials furnished by the master is subsequently used by painters working on the same building, and injures one of them. Hoar v. Merritt (1886) 62 Mich. 386, 29 N. W. 15.

The fact that the delinquent and injured servants were engaged in different kinds of work may, however, be material as tending to show that the undertaking of the master was to furnish the instrumentality in a completed condition. See also cases cited in VI. g, 2, infra.

3. Completion of appliance before plaintiff began to work.

The established doctrine is that, wherever the circumstances were otherwise such that the injured servant could not have recovered if he had already entered the defendant's service, where the defective appliance was completed, his position is not in any way improved by the mere fact that he began work after such construction was completed.

An employer "owes one who is about to enter his service no duty to inspect all the work which has been done by his servants previously, and which ordinarily may be intrusted to them without liability to their fellow servants for their negligence." O'Connor v. Rich (1895) 164 Mass. 560, 42 N. E. 111, where the servant was injured by the fall of a scaffold erected by his fellow workmen a few days before he entered the service, from suitable materials supplied by the master; Arkerson v. Dennison (1875) 117 Mass. 407; Olsen v. Nixon (1898) 61 N. J. L. 671, 40 Atl. 694; McCone v. Gallagher (1897) 16 App. Div. 272, 44 N. Y. Supp. 697. In the latter case the judges, while not differing in opinion as to the general principle, disagreed as to the propriety of applying it under the circumstances in evidence. The reasoning which led the majority to the conclusion that the servant could not recover was as follows: "Great stress is laid, in this case, upon the fact that the plaintiff was employed to do the carpenter work after the timbers or sleepers upon which the planks were to be put had been placed in position by the carpenters employed by the defendant to do this work; but it seems to me that that fact is not at all material. The question is not so much as to whether the particular neglect or negligence which selected this improper piece of timber and placed it in this position was the negligence of a fellow servant, as it is whether it was the duty of the master, as master, to furnish these carpenters, employed by him to do carpenter work, which work involved the placing of these timbers in the position in which they were placed, a completed structure or scaffold for the purpose of doing the work. . . . Suppose one of these planks which he used in this way had broken, and the injury had resulted therefrom; it is clear that the master would not have been liable. Upon what principle, then, can he be said to be liable because one of the timbers that the plaintiff used to rest the planks upon was insufficient for the purpose? Is it because the timbers had been placed in the position in which they were when the plaintiff used them, by some men in the employ of the defendant, who, when the accident happened, were the plaintiff's fellow workmen? It seems to me clear that no liability of the defendant could be predicated upon such a distinction. Upon what principle can it be said that this plaintiff was not as much bound to examine these particular timbers which had been placed in this position by others as he was bound to examine the planks upon which he stood, and which he shifted as the necessities of the work required? Both the planks and the timbers were materials furnished by the master for the use of his men. An examination of the timbers would have disclosed this knot, which it is alleged was the cause of the plank's breaking. It was not the master's duty to examine each timber before it was put in place by the carpenters, nor did he assume that task. If the master furnished for his workmen proper timbers for the purpose,—and it is conceded that these timbers were proper if they had been of ordinary strength and without knots,—and employed competent men to put the timber in place, he had performed his duty to the men who used them. It seems to me that this is expressly within the principle established by the cases before cited." The following passage from the dissenting opinion is well worth quoting as an extremely able exposition of the other possible theory of the evidence: "If, with the latter, he and his fellow servants, as a detail of their own work, had undertaken to construct the scaffold and had selected improper, where they might have chosen proper, materials, the defendant would not be liable for injuries resulting from such defective construction. Here, however, the scaffold was erected ten days before the accident and one week before the plaintiff went to work upon it; and the plaintiff was directed by the defendant's foreman to get on this scaffold to do the ceiling work. The scaffold was about 10 or 11 feet above the floor at the wall, and about 7 feet above the floor in front, and, unless properly constructed, was necessarily a dangerous place for the plaintiff and the other carpenters to work. That the knot in the sleeper made it dangerous to use in the construction of the scaffold was fairly to be inferred; and it is undisputed that the plaintiff had no part in the selection of the defective sleeper. When he went to work he found the scaffold already erected; and, having been ordered by the foreman to go to work thereon, he was justified in assuming that the master had discharged the duty which rested upon him of supplying a safe scaffold. I do not think this inference is in any way weakened by the fact appearing that the scaffold was actually constructed by the other carpenters who had preceded the plaintiff upon the work. If the plaintiff had assisted in its construction, or had been present and working at the time it was erected, a different question would be presented. Where, however, as here, the plaintiff under what must be regarded as the master's instructions, went to work upon the scaffold already erected, he had a right to assume that the master had discharged the duty of supplying a safe scaffold. If the accident, instead of occurring on this armory, had occurred subsequently on another building which the defendant was engaged in constructing, and to and upon which he had furnished for the use of the workmen this defective scaffold, I do not think, as against a workman who had no previous knowledge of how or by whom the scaffold was constructed, that the master could claim, as matter of law, that he was relieved from responsibility, because, as a matter of fact, at some previous time the scaffold had been constructed by workmen in his employ. I can see no distinction in principle between the position of the plaintiff, who came upon the building after the scaffold was erected, with no knowledge of its prior history or hand in its construction as connected with this armory, and his position as affected by a defective scaffold furnished in another building."

The only peremptory inference which can be drawn from such a circumstance, coupled with the servant's ignorance of the defective construction, is that the servant was not guilty of contributory negligence. Hogan v. Smith (1891) 125 N. Y. 774, 26 N. E. 742.

Evidence of this character, however, like that adverted to in the last subdivision, may tend to show the actual character of the master's undertaking in regard to the defective instrumentality.

g. When the delinquency is deemed not to be in respect to the details of the work.

The limits of the doctrines discussed in the preceding subdivisions of this subtitle will be more clearly apprehended if we contrast with the cases already reviewed those cited below, in which the servant was held entitled to recover.

1. Appliance furnished by the master in person.

Where, in unloading a vessel in a shipyard, an iron hook was fastened by the owner of the yard to the wharf, to hold a rope and tackle used for the work, running from the ship to the wharf, the hook must be considered an appliance used in the business, for reasonable care in maintaining the security of which the owner of the yard for whom the work was done is responsible to his employees. Olsen v. Starin (1899) 43 App. Div. 422, 60 N. Y. Supp. 134. See also Colton v. Richards (1878) 123 Mass. 484, where the effect of a personal superintendence by the master is adverted to.

2. Implied undertaking to supply instrumentality in a completed condition.

Compare VI. g, 5, 6, infra.

A scaffold which is in the nature of an appliance furnished to the workmen to enable them to put in place the steel superstructure of a bridge is not within the scope of the doctrine that the master is not liable for the unsafety of a structure the erection of which is part of the work to be done. F. C. Austin Mfg. Co. v. Johnson (1898) 32 C. C. A. 309, 60 U. S. App. 681, 89 Fed. 677. The court said: "In the case at bar the scaffold was intended, not only as a place whereon the workmen were to stand, but as a support upon which was to be placed the entire superstructure of the bridge during the course of its erection. If it should fall through faulty construction it might cause the entire or partial destruction of the steel work furnished by the company, and the company would be compelled to make good all damages thus caused. It is clear that such workmen as the defendant in error could not be expected to know the strain that would be placed upon this scaffold in the erection of the steel superstructure. It is equally clear that it would not have been open to the defendant in error to exercise any control over the method in which the scaffold was erected or the material used in its construction. The purpose for which this scaffold was to be used renders inapplicable the reasons upon which the rule is based, that ordinarily the master is not responsible for the safety of stagings which the workmen put up as aids in carrying out the particular work they are employed to perform. The use to which it was intended to subject this structure, in that there would be placed thereon, not only the dead weight of the material composing the bridge, but also the strain caused by placing the different parts in proper position, clearly shows that the erection of the staging was not a matter that could be safely left to the control of ordinary laborers, but required skilled control by persons who from experience would know what strain would be placed on the staging; and the evidence shows that in its erection the defendant in error exercised no control or judgment, but, on the contrary, it was erected solely under the direction of Charles Killifer, who, as a skilled expert, had been sent out by the company to erect the bridge and settle for it with the county authorities."

A servant who is set to work in a chamber of a mine after it has already been timbered may recover for injuries caused by the fall of the roof, if the defective conditions could have been discovered by a timely inspection. Western Coal & Min. Co. v. Ingraham (1895) 17 C. C. A. 71, 36 U. S. App. 1, 70 Fed. 219.

In Tomaselli v. John Griffiths Cycle Corp. (1896) 9 App. Div. 127, 128, 41 N. Y. Supp. 51, plaintiff, after he had been in defendant's employ a day and a half, was called to assist about the raising of a heavy box, containing material manufactured by defendant, from the basement of the building to the sidewalk above. The elevator by which this material was usually hoisted was out of repair, and the shipping clerk, having the matter in charge, directed and assisted about providing a temporary hoisting apparatus for raising the box in the elevator shaft. This, when complete, consisted of a piece of iron laid across the space and resting upon the combing of the elevator shaft on either side. The tackle to hoist was a block pulley, which was attached to the iron, and a chain run through the pulleys, which the men pulled upon in hoisting the box. Plaintiff had nothing to do with fixing this apparatus, although he saw the iron and knew generally what it was. While the box was being hoisted, the iron broke and plaintiff was precipitated into the cellar. The court said: "It is quite evident from this testimony that the construction of the tackle, by means of which the box was to be raised, was not a detail of the work which plaintiff was required or expected to perform, but was an appliance by means of which he performed the labor required of him. The obligation was therefore imposed upon the defendant to exercise reasonable care and prudence in the selection of this appliance, and to see that it was reasonably suitable and safe for the purpose to which it was applied. This duty was primary, and could not be delegated to a servant so as to shield the master from liability for damage occasioned through an omission of the servant to properly discharge it."

A servant ordered by the master to perform work as a machinist in underground trenches opened and prepared for him has a right to assume that the place has been made reasonably safe by the master through other and competent servants employed by him, and does not assume the risk of neglect of the latter to brace or protect the sides of the trenches. Krans v. Long Island R. Co. (1890) 123 N. Y. 1, 25 N. E. 206.

Men comprising a crew of workmen exclusively engaged in putting up such staging and scaffolding as are needed for the use of workmen engaged in the general business of a ship-building company are not fellow servants with men engaged in the general work of the company. Sims v. American Steel-Barge Co. (1894) 56 Minn. 68, 57 N. W. 322 (distinguishing the cases in which the furnishing and preparation of a structure is part of the work which the employees are hired to perform).

A master is liable for defects in a ladder made at his carpenter's shop and issued for the use of the masons in his employ. Flanigan v. Guggenheim Smelting Co. (1899) 63 N. J. L. 647, 44 Atl. 762 (same distinction relied on).

272, 44 N. Y. Supp. 697, the court instanced the case of painters employed to paint the outside of a building, who are required to work upon a completed scaffold built for that purpose, which is lowered or raised as the work progresses, and said: "It is quite obvious that it is the duty of the master to furnish such an appliance; and where the men must rely upon the care of the master, or those employed by him, in putting together a proper structure necessary for the men to use in the performance of the work upon which they are employed, and where any negligence in the selection of the materials, or the proper use of those materials, in constructing the completed scaffold, would expose the men to serious danger, neglect in the performance of that duty will render the master liable."

In Corson v. Coal Hill Coal Co. (1897) 101 Iowa, 224, 70 N. W. 185, in sustaining an instruction to the effect that the owner of a coal mine having a sloping entry through which the coal is brought to the surface owes to an employee riding in the cars through such entry the duty of exercising reasonable care to have the roof of the entry sufficiently propped so that rock will not fall on the track, the court said: "The rule of the instruction applies to a case where a place is furnished for the servant to do his work, and the keeping of the place in repair is not incidental to the work to be performed. . . . The undisputed facts of this case bring it within the latter rule, so far as concerns the duties of the parties. The duties of the plaintiff had no concern with the preparation or looking after the entry. It was the general passageway to and from the mine,—a completed work; a place in which work was to be done in no way connected with its construction or preservation. It was a place for such work as the plaintiff was doing, and furnished by the employer. This holding is not against that in Fosburg v. Phillips Fuel Co. (1894) 93 Iowa, 54, 61 N. W. 400. That case was expressly determined on the rule as to the negligence of a fellow servant. As the work of riding the trip was disconnected from duties as to the roof of the entry in which plaintiff was riding, it was defendant's duty, through a competent person, to look after its safety. The case, as now presented, does not involve a question as to the negligence of a fellow servant."

Where a fireman, while working in the boiler room of the defendant, fell into a hole that had been dug and left open in front of the boiler, by the defendant's employees, who were making a foundation there for an "economizer," leaving the hole uncovered or the excavation in an unsafe condition was the negligence of the master. Frye v. Bath Gas & Electric Co. (1900) 94 Me. 17, 46 Atl. 804 (operation of digging the holes said to be connected with and a part of the plant itself).

Where a permanent tunnel is under construction, as fast as completed the finished part becomes an "appliance or means furnished by the master by which the remaining work is to be prosecuted." Hanley v. California Bridge & Constr. Co. (1899) 127 Cal. 232, 47 L. R. A. 597, 59 Pac. 577.

In Manning v. Hogan (1879) 78 N. Y. 615, the evidence was that it was a particular branch of mechanical occupation to put up a scaffold like the one in question (i. e., for doing the plaster work in a building); that the persons employed were not of that occupation; and that it was built of insufficient material, both in quality and quantity. It was held "that the question of negligence in building the scaffold was for the jury; that it was not sufficient that there was enough of suitable material provided to build the scaffold. It needed that there should be skill and judgment in the use thereof." But the case is not fully reported, and it may also be regarded as having turned upon the failure of the master to employ competent servants,—the construction placed upon it in Beesley v. F. W. Wheeler & Co. (1894) 103 Mich. 196, 27 L. R. A. 266, 61 N. W. 658.

Another doubtful case is Green v. Banta (1882) 18 Jones & S. 156, which, while it asserted the existence of a duty of furnishing a safe scaffold, does not state whether such duty arose by express contract, by necessary implication from the peculiar facts, or upon the broad ground that a scaffold builder and a plasterer are, under no circumstances, fellow servants. But probably this decision is to be explained in the same way as the one last cited.

In McMahon v. McHale (1899) 174 Mass. 320, 54 N. E. 854, the master was held liable for defects in a derrick on the ground that it "was a piece of machinery, part of the fitting up of a stone yard, . . . rather than an appliance to be put together and set up and moved from place to place by workmen who were using it."

Where there were furnished to the plaintiff and his coemployees materials with which to construct a scaffold which were not proper for the purpose, and which made the scaffold, when constructed, an unsafe and improper appliance for the doing of the work, . . . If the master employed a person to act in his place to furnish such material, the negligence of such person, so appointed to act for the master in the discharge of the duty which he owed to his employees, was the negligence of the master, for which the master was responsible. Richard v. Hayes (1897) 17 App. Div. 422, 45 N. Y. Supp. 324. Compare also the rule that the furnishing of slide stakes for retaining the load of a railway car is not a part of the operation of loading, such stakes being a part of the equipment of the car. See III. c, 11, supra.

8. Suitable materials not furnished.

A city is not, as matter of law, free from liability for personal injuries to a workman caused by the caving in of a trench in which he was digging, although there were materials 2 miles away which the foreman had authority to use to shore up the sides and make the trench safe, since the jury might properly find that they were practically inaccessible on account of the distance, as in such case the negligence is that of the city, and not merely of a fellow servant in failing to use the materials at his command. Fitzsimmons v. Taunton (1893) 160 Mass. 223, 35 N. E. 549. "On this view of the facts," said the court, "the . . . [workman] was set to work in a place of danger without the precautions being taken for his safety which his employer was bound to see taken."

4. Servants not left free as to the selection of the materials.

See VIII. a, infra.

5. Permanent character of the instrumentality relied upon.

If the implement, appliance, or structure is permanent in its character, the duty of exercising a reasonable degree of care in its selection and maintenance is one from which the master cannot escape. Whereas, if it is portable, its erection, location, and operation may be, and generally are, regarded as mere details of the work, which pertain to the employee. Yaw v. Whitmore (1899) 46 App. Div. 422, 61 54 L. R. A.

N. Y. Supp. 731. There a derrick consisting of a mast 10 inches square and 40 feet long, with a boom of the same dimensions, was firmly attached to the ground by planks in which a metal plate had been imbedded, and which were weighted down with heavy stones. The derrick remained in this place nearly five months, and until the completion of the work for which it was used. It was held that it was a permanent structure, within the rule that a master must use reasonable care in providing his servant with suitable appliances and in keeping them in repair.

In Cunningham v. Sicilian Asphalt Paving Co. (1900) 49 App. Div. 380, 63 N. Y. Supp. 357, the defendant was held liable for defects in a platform regularly used by laborers to stand on while they were unloading cars. The fact that the planks were loose and movable was denied to be material. The structure was said to be "permanent in its nature," and distinguished from an "ordinary appliance" relating to an isolated job or a transient undertaking."

Plaintiff was taken by defendant's foreman from outside the grain elevator, where he was accustomed to work, to a place within, comparatively dark, and, being instructed to step on a raised platform, walk to a bin, and ascertain if it was open, started to do so, when the platform collapsed, and one of his legs was crushed in a hopper beneath. The platform was constructed nearly nine years previously, and, until a few weeks before, its sole use was to enable workmen, on removing the cover, to watch the movement of grain through the conductor. Since then, temporary bins were constructed on that floor, and, to open them, it was necessary to step on the hopper boxes. No inspection was ever made of the condition of the box, and the only evidence in that regard was that the foreman had stood thereon two minutes before the accident. It was held that defendant was guilty of negligence. Berry v. Atlantic Storage Co. (1900) 50 App. Div. 590, 64 N. Y. Supp. 292.

A complaint for injuries to a servant, alleging that the latter, in the performance of his duty for defendant, was necessarily required to stand and work at and near an embankment of earth on defendant's land; that such embankment was supported by timbers, braces, and planks; that said supports gave way and broke by reason of their rottenness and insufficiency, thereby causing the injuries; that said supports had been allowed to remain for an unusually long time, and a much longer time than they should have been permitted to remain, and that they were not properly inspected by defendant, and had become worn and rotten,—sufficiently alleges that defendant was guilty of negligence in failing to furnish a safe place. Nicholas v. Burlington. C. R. & N. R. Co. (1899) 78 Minn. 43, 80 N. W. 776.

6. Adjustment treated as a nondelegable function.

See III. d, 20, supra.

7. Operation not one of the transitory class.

An employer is not, as matter of law, free from liability caused by the fall of shafting which had been attached to the ceiling by the carpenter the day before, on the theory that the putting up of such shafting belongs to the "transitory class for which the employer is not responsible beyond furnishing a choice of proper materials or instrumentalities." Copthorne v. Hardy (1899) 173 Mass. 400, 53 N. E. 915.

VII. Negligence of servants whose duty it is to keep the instrumentalities in proper condition; whom not imputed to the master.

a. Theory that a master is never liable for negligence in regard to inspection and repairs.

One view, for which there is a considerable body of judicial authority, is simply that a master is liable for the negligence of the agents by whom the instrumentalities were originally supplied, but not for the negligence of the agents to whom he has deputed the function of seeing that they continue to satisfy the legal standard of safety. Such a conception has the merit of simplicity, but is regarded by the writer as wholly illogical, for reasons already explained in a note to O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900; Minn.) 51 L. R. A. 569. The decisions which are certainly or apparently referable to this doctrine are collected below. Some of them, however, have been entirely overruled, while others have been greatly qualified by later rulings in the same jurisdiction, which reflect more or less strongly the influence of the theory that the duty of maintenance, no less than the duty of supply, is absolute. Whenever there has been a merely partial recognition of this theory, the situation is probably due to the fact that the courts have been unable to break away altogether from existing precedents which date from a period at which the character of the negligent act had not yet assumed its present importance as a differentiating element. United Kingdom.

A master has been held not to be liable for the negligence of an employee appointed to examine materials, in Ormond v. Holland (1858) El. Bl. & El. 102; of a chief engineer who allowed defective tackle to be used, in Searle v. Lindsay (1861) 11 C. B. N. S. 429, 8 Jur. N. S. 746, 31 L. J. C. P. N. S. 106, 10 Week. Rep. 89, 5 L. T. N. S. 427; of an "underlooker" in a mine, whose duty it was to keep the workings in safe condition, in Hall v. Johnson (1865) 3 Hurlst. & C. 589, 34 L. J. Exch. N. S. 222, 11 Jur. N. S. 180, 11 L. T. N. S. 779, 13 Week. Rep. 411.

In Webb v. Rennie (1865) 4 Fost. & F. 608, Cockburn, Ch. J., charged the jury as follows: "In the case of a manufacturer employing machinery which might be attended with danger to the persons employed about it, a danger which might be greatly aggravated by the machinery not being in proper condition,—as, for instance, in the case of the boiler of a steam engine bursting, as it would be more likely to do if in an improper condition,—the master manufacturer might have no means of personally knowing its condition himself, and, the question being whether he had used reasonable care and diligence to ascertain it, all that could be reasonably expected of him would be that he should employ some competent person from time to time to examine it. The master must either ascertain the state of the machinery or apparatus himself, or employ some competent person to do so; and if he did employ such a person, and a workman was injured in consequence of that person's neglect of his duty in that respect, the master would not be liable to one of his servants for such negligence of a fellow servant in the particular matter."

In Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, it was held that a mine owner was not liable for injuries due to an explosion of fire-damp which resulted from the faulty construction of a temporary scaffold by the manager of the pit. A full review of this case will be found in the note to O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900; Minn.) 51 L. R. A. pp. 564 et seq.

Wright v. Roxburgh (1864) 2 Macph. Sc. Sess. Cas. 3d series, 748.

Negligence in allowing structures to fall into a state of decay, and to remain in that state, was regarded as the act of mere employees, in Allen v. New Gas Co. (1876) L. R. 1 Exch. Div. 251, 45 L. J. Exch. N. S. 668, 34 L. T. N. S. 541.

British colonies.

An injury caused by the failure of brakes to work properly, so that a train runs down two trackmen, is conclusively presumed to have been due to the negligence of one of the trainmen, where the evidence is that an examination at the last inspecting station had not disclosed any defects, that the defects which prevented the brakes from working were of the most obvious character, capable of being remedied merely by tightening a bolt and taking up a rod, and that shortly before the accident the train had been easily kept under control upon a gradient as steep as the one where the injury was received. Plant v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (1867) 27 U. C. Q. B. 78.

A running foreman, whose duty it is to look after the condition of locomotives, is not a vice principal. Brown v. Board of Works (1882) 2 Vict. L. Rep. 414 (dissenting, Highbotham, J.).

In the event of a master not personally superintending the repairs of his machinery, the limit of his duty is to select competent persons for this purpose, and to furnish them with all adequate materials required for the work. Baird v. Dunn (1893) 83 N. B. 156.

Alabama.

In a very recent Alabama case it was laid down that the common-law duty, resting upon an employer, of maintaining ways and appliances reasonably safe for the employees' use, may be delegated by its committal to competent agents; and that a complaint which avers negligence in respect of such maintenance to have been that of a person in the same common service, who is intrusted by the employer with the duty of maintenance, does not show a breach of such common-law duty when there is no averment of negligence in the selection of such person. Woodward Iron Co. v. Cook (1899) 124 Ala. 349, 27 So. 455 (employee intrusted with the duty of seeing that a tram track in a mine is in proper condition held to be a fellow servant with an employee engaged in spragging the wheels of the tram cars for the purpose of checking their speed on the track).

This rule is said to have been established by Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Thomas (1868) 42 Ala. 672; Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Smith (1877) 59 Ala. 245; and Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Carroll (1898) 97 Ala. 126, 18 L. R. A. 433, 11 So. 803.

In Smoot v. Mobile & M. R. Co. (1880) 67 Ala. 13 (negligence in inspecting loading of cars), the court said: "When such appliances have been furnished,—when diligence has been observed in procuring them,—the use of them is necessarily intrusted to the servants of a railroad company, as is their care and inspection, and the repair of them, and determining when the use must be abandoned until repairs are made. This duty may be intrusted to those operating the appliances, or confided to other servants having no other duty than that of inspection or of repair. However this may be, the several servants are in the same circle of employment,—derive duty and compensation from the same source, and are laboring for a common purpose. They are fellow servants, and the master cannot be made answerable to the one for the negligence of the other. . . . Knowledge of the defective condition of the car, a want of prudence in its use, is traceable only to fellow servants of the appellee, whose care and diligence he is presumed to have consented to risk; whatever of guards against the use of defective cars were reasonable, so far as the evidence shows, and to which it could justly be expected the appellant would resort, were adopted."

It was denied that a master mechanic was a vice principal, in Columbus & I. C. R. Co. v. Arnold (1869) 31 Ind. 174, 99 Am. Dec. 615, but this decision is no longer good law in Indiana. See later cases cited in III. d. supra, especially Indiana Car. Co. v. Parker (1885) 100 Ind. 181.

Louisiana.

An engine-driver and an employee whose duty it was to keep locomotives in repair were held to be fellow servants, in Hugh v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. (1851) 6 La. Ann. 496, 54 Am. Dec. 565. This is one of the cases which antedate the formulation of the rule as to a general class of nondelegable duties. The decision was a simple application of the doctrine of common employment.

Maine.

In Beaulieu v. Portland Co. (1860) 48 Me. 291, it was regarded as well settled that the responsibility of a master is restricted to the employment of competent servants and the provision of adequate appliances. But the doctrine of nondelegable duties has since been adopted. Shanny v. Androscoggin Mills (1876) 66 Me. 420.

Maryland.

It was denied that a master mechanic of a railway was a vice principal, in Shauck v. Northern C. R. Co. (1866) 25 Md. 462; Cumberland & P. R. Co. v. State use of Moran (1875) 44 Md. 283. The distinction between absolute and delegable duties was not discussed by the court, the nonliability being referred to the conception that the plaintiff, a train hand, and the delinquent were in the same general service.

In Wonder v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1870) 82 Md. 411, 3 Am. Rep. 143, a railway company was held not to be liable for injuries to a brakeman resulting from a defective brake, which it was the duty of fellow servants to keep in repair. The theory that the character of the act determines whether or not the negligence is that of a vice principal was not noticed. The case followed was Searle v. Lindsay (1861) 11 C. B. N. S. 429, 8 Jur. N. S. 746, 31 L. J. C. P. N. S. 106, 10 Week. Rep. 89, 5 L. T. N. S. 427, supra.

In State use of Hamelin v. Malster (1881) 57 Md. 287, the master was held to be liable only for the negligence of an employee to whom is intrusted the selection of subordinates and the procuring of instrumentalities.

That the duty of repair is delegable is also, in part at least, the foundation of the decision, in Yates v. McCullough Iron Co. (1888) 69 Md. 870, 16 Atl. 280. See note to O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900; Minn.) 51 L. R. A. 567.

Massachusetts.

In King v. Boston & W. R. Corp. (1851) 9 Cush. 112, it was held that keeping a railway in proper repair is "the work of servants or laborers, as much as any other part of the business of the corporation," and that the company was not liable for the negligence of the repairers.

In Seaver v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1860) 14 Gray, 466, a servant of a railroad company was held unable to recover for an injury caused solely by the breaking of an axle, where the failure to discover the flaw resulted from the negligence of the employee whose duty it was to examine the cars and other running apparatus of the road, and to keep them in proper repair. In this case the distinction between furnishing and maintenance is distinctly drawn, 54 L. R. A.

the instruction approved being that "the corporation in conveying the plaintiff in their cars, acting through their agent, whose duty it was to provide and keep in use safe and suitable engines and tenders on the road, were bound to use due and reasonable care in providing and using on the road engines and tenders suitably constructed with all the appliances and safeguards necessary to render them safe; and if the omission to provide a safety beam to the tender at the time of the accident constituted a want of due and reasonable care, which rendered the tender unsafe, and such omission was the efficient cause of the accident and of the injury to the plaintiff, he might maintain this action."

In Cooper v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. (1867) 14 Allen, 193, it was laid down, although a master was required to use proper care in order to see that his floors were of sufficient strength to support any machine which it was necessary to move over or upon them, "the nature of this case which they are bound to use was such that [they] the defendants might have performed their legal duty by employing suitable persons of competent skill and experience, whose business it was to keep the floors in such condition as to repairs that they were fit and safe for use for any of the purposes for which it might become necessary to appropriate them," and that, "if they were diligent and careful to this extent, and any want of repair had not existed for so long a time as to show absolute negligence on the part of the defendants [master], then the accident would have been attributable to the negligence of an agent or servant in the service of a common employer with the plaintiff."

The fact that water failed to run from a hose during a fire is prima facie attributable to the negligence of the servants in not keeping it in proper order or in putting it in operation, and does not constitute evidence sufficient to justify holding the master responsible for injuries caused by the fire. Jones v. Granite Mills (1878) 126 Mass. 84, 30 Am. Rep. 661.

In the next subdivision we shall see how far these decisions have been qualified by the more recent ones. See also II. j. supra.

Mississippi.

In New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Hughes (1873) 49 Miss. 258, and Howd v. Mississippi C. R. Co. (1874) 50 Miss. 178, it was held that servants engaged in repairing a railroad or its appurtenances are not, in order to hold the company responsible to an employee, representatives of the company. The nonliability of the company for anything beyond the selection of servants and the furnishing of materials was distinctly affirmed in the latter case.

Missouri.

The ruling in McDermott v. Pacific R. Co. (1860) 30 Mo. 115, that the negligence of a superintendent in allowing a bridge to get into bad repair was not imputable to the employer, is no longer law in this state. See cases cited in II. d. supra.

New Jersey.

In Essex County Electric Co. v. Kelly (1894) 57 N. J. L. 100, 29 Atl. 427, it was said: "It is a matter of judicial disagreement whether a master can discharge the duty . . . [of examining and ascertaining whether appliances have become unfit or unsafe from wear and tear or otherwise], and the similar duty of keeping tools and appliances in repair, by selecting and employing competent persons to make inspections and repairs. In our courts it is held that the master's duty may be thus discharged." The court cited Rogers Locomotive & Mach. Works v. Hand (1888) 50 N. J. L. 464, 14 Atl. 766, and Harrison v. Central R. Co. (1866) 31 N. J. L. 293. In the latter of these cases, where the plaintiff was injured by the fall of a bridge, the court remarked: "From the relation between the company and their brakeman, the legal consequence seems to have been deduced by the pleader that the former, with regard to the latter, was bound to keep the bridge in a safe condition. This is not a true statement of the obligation of the company. It was not near so absolute; for if the bridge was insecure from a secret defect which the company was not able to discern by the exercise of reasonable diligence and skill, no responsibility would have fallen on the defendant on account of its defective state. If, as was stated on the argument, the company, in point of fact, directed its agents, who were possessed of competent skill, to examine at stated periods the bridge in question, and such agents reported to the company that the structure was in a secure condition, and no circumstances existed which were calculated to impair a reasonable confidence in such report, I think it is plain, upon the principles of law above propounded, that, even if the agents making such report acted carelessly in the discharge of their duties, or even falsely reported their conclusions to the company, that under such a state of facts the plaintiff could not sustain this suit. To warrant a recovery in this case in favor of the employee, who is here represented by the plaintiff, the fault which forms the basis of the action must be that of the company, and not simply the negligence of a fellow servant."

A master is not liable for injuries to a workman in a tunnel, caused by the negligence of a laborer whose duty it is to deliver on the surface at the shaft, or there use or keep in repair, the instrumentalities provided for the safe transportation of the workmen. McAndrews v. Burns (1876) 39 N. J. L. 117. But see the later New Jersey cases cited in VII. b, infra. New York.

In Chapman v. Erie R. Co. (1873) 1 Thomp. & C. 526, the opinion, after quoting the headnote in Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468, to the effect that the only ground of liability which the law recognizes is that which arises from the personal negligence of the master, proceeded to criticize the case as follows: "The rule as thus stated is obviously of small consequence as a protection to the servants or employees of a corporation, when it is considered that a corporation acts entirely through officers and agents, and there can be no other personal negligence committed by, or imputed to, it except the negligence of such officer or agent; and when it is held, also, that all the agents and employees of a corporation are fellow servants of a common master, it is difficult to see why, under such rules, corporations are not virtually absolved from all the common-law liability of a master to take care of his servants, and protect them from unjust and unreasonable danger and injuries resulting from the negligence of others. But the recent case of Laning v. New York C. R. Co. (1872) 49 N. Y. 531, 10 Am. Rep. 417, shows that the present court of appeals is receding from this extreme ground. This case asserts a sounder and more reasonable rule. Judge Folger, who gives the opinion of the court, says: "The duty of the master to his servants is to use reasonable care to provide and employ none but competent and skillful servants, and to discharge from his service, on notice thereof, any who fail to continue such." This criticism, however, appears to be based on a misapprehension of the true purport of the earlier case, which merely decides that, in the absence of testimony going to prove negligence in the construction of a bridge or in the selection of the servants employed to supervise and test it, or in the performance of their duties by these servants, the injured servant must fall in his action unless he shows that the managing officers of the corporation had notice, actual or constructive, of the defective condition of the bridge. In other words, there are several states of facts upon which an employer may be charged with personal negligence, and if the evidence is inconsistent with the theory that he was negligent in certain specified ways, the servant must fall back upon some other theory. Under the circumstances in Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468, where the testimony shows that due care has been exercised by the directors themselves in seeing that sound structures and competent supervising agents have been provided, and that these agents themselves have not been guilty of negligence in the premises, there was no theory to fall back upon except one based upon the hypothesis that the directors had knowledge of the decayed condition of the bridge through some other avenue of information than the supervising agents appointed by them, and with any such hypothesis the evidence was quite inconsistent. That the case really goes no farther than this so far as the actual decision is concerned is quite apparent from the opinion. But it must be admitted that, by citing with approval the ruling in Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, the court has shown a disposition to countenance that much more sweeping doctrine under which a master is not liable, even for the negligence of a servant to whom he deposes one or more of the duties which the law imposes on him for the benefit of all persons in his employment. The extent of the liability of a master for the negligent act of a competent servant is, however, a very different question from that raised in Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468, and the approval of the English case may, for this reason, be regarded as quite supererogatory. Except in so far as the broad principle of Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, may be supposed to have been adopted by the court in Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468, it cannot be said that, as was suggested in Chapman v. Erie R. Co. (1873) 1 Thomp. & C. 526, the court of appeals has changed its ground in Laning v. New York C. R. Co. (1872) 49 N. Y. 531, 10 Am. Rep. 417, for there the master was held liable for the reason that personal negligence was shown by the retention of an incompetent servant,—a species of negligence which was negated by the testimony in Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468.

In Malone v. Hathaway (1876) 64 N. Y. 5, 21 Am. Rep. 573 (Church, Ch. J., and Rapallo, J., dissenting), it was held that an employer is not liable for the negligence of a carpenter employed to examine and make repairs in the building in which his business is carried on. The majority of the court cited with approval Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, but it seems to be impossible to reconcile the ruling with the other decisions of the same court, referred to in III. d, supra. Ohio.

In Ohio a car inspector is held to be a fellow servant of the trainmen. Little Miami R. Co. v. Fitzpatrick (1884) 42 Ohio St. 318; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Lamphere (1894) 9 Ohio C. C. 263, both following Columbus & X. R. Co. v. Webb (1861) 12 Ohio St. 475, which was itself based upon Ormond v. Holland (1858) El. Bl. & El. 102, one of the rulings in which the decision of the House of Lords in Wilson v. Merry was anticipated.

Pennsylvania.
In Bemisch v. Roberts (1891) 143 Pa. 1, 21 Atl. 998, the court approved of an instruction in which the jury were told, among other things, that the defendant was not liable for an accident caused by a defect of which he knew, or ought to have known, provided he had a person in his employ whose duty it was to keep the appliances in good condition. But there was no testimony showing that the employer or any agent of his having control had any knowledge of the defect, and the case was ultimately made to turn on the facts that the state of the appliance was as open to the observation of the plaintiff as of the defendant, and that the proximate cause of the accident was the negligence of the plaintiff's fellow servants in selecting an unsound appliance when they had the opportunity of selecting one that was in good condition.

A car inspector was held to be a fellow servant of a brakeman in Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hughes (1888) 119 Pa. 301, 13 Atl. 286. The court said: "If, however, the company employ competent and skillful persons for the purpose of inspection, and afford them reasonable opportunities and facilities for the work under proper instructions, the company will not ordinarily be liable for the negligent performance of the work by their employees, to a fellow employee, unless the company knew, or by ordinary diligence ought to have known, of the defective manner in which the inspection was conducted. We are clearly of opinion, too, that a brakeman and a car inspector are in the same circle of appointment: they co-operate in the same business, and the former knows that the employment of the latter is one of the incidents of their common service. But while the performance of the duty of inspection must necessarily be committed in detail to the employees, the general regulation is in the hands of the company, and it is the duty of the company to provide suitable persons, in sufficient numbers at proper places, with reasonable opportunities to accomplish the work."

But see the decisions of this court cited in the next subdivision.

Tennessee.
In Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Foster (1882) 10 Lea, 351, the court followed Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Thomas (1868) 42 Ala. 672, to the point that a car inspector and brakeman were fellow servants.

A master has also been held not to be liable for a failure to retemper knives of nail machines after being heated for the purpose of sharpening them, if the omission is that of a fellow servant. Knoxville Iron Co. v. Dobson (1881) 7 Lea, 367 (discussing charge; no opinion expressed as to whether the act was that of a fellow servant. Turney, J., dissented, holding that a servant having such a duty to perform was not a fellow servant of a feeder of the machine). Vermont.

In an early case in Vermont, following, as may be surmised from the citations of counsel, the trend of the English decisions which preceded and anticipated the ruling in Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 80, supra, it was held that an engineer injured through the negligence of a master mechanic, whose duty it is to see that the engines are kept in repair, cannot recover damages from the common employer. The ground was taken that the rule by which the master impliedly warrants the soundness of machinery, so far as the exercise of due care will enable him to discover any unsoundness therein, applies only to the condition of the machinery at the time it is put into the hands of the servant. There is no warranty that the servants shall faithfully discharge their duty in keeping the machinery in the original safe condition. Hard v. Vermont & C. R. Co. (1860) 32 Vt. 473, holding that an engineer injured through the negligence of a master mechanic whose duty it is to see that the engines are kept in repair, cannot recover damages from the common employer. But this decision is practically overruled by Davis v. Central Vermont R. Co. (1882) 55 Vt. 84, 45 Am. Rep. 590, holding that a railroad company is liable for injuries caused by a defective condition of its track, which would have been known to the company's bridge builder and roadmaster if proper inspection had been exercised.

b. Theory that the liability of the master depends on the subject-matter of the inspection or repairs neglected.

According to another theory, which is a compromise between the doctrine applied in the cases just cited and that which declares the duty of maintenance to be nondelegable (see III. d, supra), the question whether an employee engaged in inspecting or repairing instrumentalities is a vice principal or a mere servant depends upon the nature of the defects which were left undiscovered or unremedied owing to his remissness. It is admitted that the decisions in which it has been attempted to give effect to this theory are admitted to be incongruous and inconsistent. See the remarks of the court in Nord Deutscher Lloyd S. S. Co. v. Ingebreghsten (1894) 57 N. J. L. 402, 31 Atl. 619. And contrast the cases tabulated in VII. b, 1-6, infra, with those reviewed in III. d, f, q, t, supra, to impart greater definiteness to the very vague conception thus relied upon.

The fundamental principle upon which the courts rely is indicated by the statement that "one line of distinction between vice principals and coemployees is in the duty, in one instance, to supply or maintain instrumentalities of the service, and, in the other, of using the instrumentalities supplied." Neutz v. Jackson Hill Coal & Coke Co. (1894) 139 Ind. 411, 38 N. E. 324, 39 N. E. 147.

On this topic a rational distinction would seem to be that when the employee's duty to inspect or repair the apparatus is incidental to his duty to use the apparatus in the common employment, then he is not intrusted with the master's duty to his fellow servant, and the master is not responsible to his fellow servant for his fault; but that, if the master has cast a duty of inspection or repair upon an employee, who is not engaged in using the apparatus in a common employment with his fellow servant, then that employee in that duty represents the master, and the master is chargeable with his default. Nord Deutscher Lloyd S. S. Co. v. Ingebreghsten (1894) 57 N. J. L. 402, 31 Atl. 619.

It was considered that the distinction was noticeable in McAndrews v. Burns (1876) 39 N. J. L. 117; Smith v. Oxford Iron Co. (1880) 42 N. J. L. 407, 36 Am. Rep. 535; Collier v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1886) 49 N. J. L. 59, 6 Atl. 437; Ross v. Walker (1891) 139 Pa. 42, 21 Atl. 157, 159; Moynihan v. Hills Co. (1888) 146 Mass. 586, 16 N. E. 574; Daley v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1888) 147 Mass. 101, 16 N. E. 690; and many other cases.

In Moynihan v. Hills Co. (1888) 146 Mass. 586, 16 N. E. 574, we find the following elaborate statement of the relations existing between servants repairing or inspecting and servants using instrumentalities: "It is obvious that difficult questions arise in cases of this kind in determining the implied obligations of the respective parties under peculiar circumstances. In many kinds of business the condition of a machine as to safety is constantly changing with the use of it, and it is safe or unsafe at a given moment according as it is properly or improperly used and managed by the servant who operates it. Moreover, certain kinds of repairs can be conveniently and properly made, under direction and supervision, by servants regularly employed in the business. In such cases both parties to the contract of service must be presumed to have contemplated that, to a certain extent, fellow servants would be employed by the master to do work in keeping the machinery safe. Work negligently done within that field, if an accident should happen from it, would seem at first to introduce a conflict between the obligation of the master to hold himself liable for want of due care in keeping his machinery safe, and the obligation of the servant not to claim damages resulting from negligence of a fellow servant. It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider the rights of the parties in such cases. The application, in each particular case, of any general rules which may be laid down, will involve a consideration of two questions of fact: First, what is the nature and character of the business, and the usual and proper general method of conducting it? Secondly, in such a business, what is reasonably necessary to be done on the part of the master to secure for the use of the workmen machinery and appliances which will always be reasonably safe? First, there is that class of cases in which the condition of a machine as to safety is constantly changing with its use, so as to require from the persons tending it, as a part of the ordinary use of it, reconstruction or readjustment of parts, as they become worn out or displaced, from materials or new parts supplied by the master for that purpose. Such work is a part of the regular business of the servant in using the machine, and not of the master in maintaining it. Negligence in doing it is, as to all other employees, negligence of a fellow servant. So far as the condition of machinery depends upon this kind of attention, the master does his duty if he employs competent and suitable persons, and supplies them with everything needed for their work. A second class of cases includes those in which repair or reconstruction of a machine is necessary, of such a kind as is commonly done, or may properly be done, under the direction of the master, by servants engaged in the general business. Both parties to the contract must be presumed to have contemplated that such work would be done by fellow servants of the employee, and he must therefore be held to have assumed all risks from their negligence in doing it. But this, it must be remembered, is a part of that work for the results of which, in the completed machine, the master agrees to hold himself responsible, so far as good results can be insured by his exercise of proper care. And so he is bound to bring to this department of the business, either in his own person or by an agent, such intelligence, skill, and experience as is reasonably to be required in one to whom in an important particular the safety of others is intrusted; and he is bound also to be reasonably diligent and careful in the use of his faculties. One who represents him in this field is not acting as a fellow servant with his other employees, within the meaning of the rule which we are considering, but is his agent or servant, for whose care and diligence he is accountable. There may be still a third class of cases, in which a machine is of such a kind, and the nature of the business in which it is used is such, that the parties could never reasonably have contemplated that any servants employed in the business would build or reconstruct it. A proprietor might buy such a machine, or send an agent or servant to buy it. In either case the purchase would be in the line of the master's duty, and he would be liable for the consequences of negligence in making it. He might hire privileges and men in a machine shop in a distant city, and build it there. His servants in that work would not be fellow servants with an employee engaged in an entirely different business. And under the doctrine of respondet superior he would be held liable for the consequences of their negligence. If he saw fit to construct or reconstruct it, in the same way, in or near the building in which it was to be used, the result would be the same. Upon our hypothesis it would be inconsistent with his implied contract to employ fellow servants of his employee in this work, and he therefore could not relieve himself from his general obligation as to the safety of his machinery by setting up that his servants in the construction or reconstruction were fellow servants with his employees in the business in which it was to be used."

Another passage relating to the first class of cases adverted to in the above extract occurs in the opinion in Rice v. King Philip Mills (1887) 144 Mass. 229, 59 Am. Rep. 80, 11 N. E. 101: "It is the duty of the master to exercise due care in employing competent servants, in providing suitable machines, and in keeping them in proper repair; and the master cannot wholly escape responsibility by delegating these duties to a servant. If this could be done, a master might escape all responsibility by employing a competent superintendent to perform all these duties. But there are defects in machinery which are of such a character that the master has been held to perform his duty if he furnishes suitable materials, and employs competent servants, and instructs them to keep the machinery in repair, although the servants neglect to make the repairs, or make them in an improper manner. The master must exercise a reasonable supervision over the manner in which his business is done; but the repairs which machines properly constructed require to keep them in running order may be intrusted to competent servants. They are regarded as incidental to the use of the machines, because they are such as machines in substantially good repair must from time to time need."

In a somewhat earlier case it was laid down that servants intrusted with the making of such ordinary repairs as the use of a machine requires to keep it in order from day to day are not vice principals. McGee v. Boston Cordage Co. (1885) 139 Mass. 445, 1 N. E. 745.

In Monmouth Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Erling (1894) 148 Ill. 521, 36 N. E. 117, the rule laid down in Moynihan v. Hills Co. (1888) 140 Mass. 586, 16 N. E. 574, supra, was approved.

The rule as formulated in a Pennsylvania case is that, where the conditions from which the servant's injury resulted were produced by the ordinary use of the appliance, and not by any defect in the substance, size, or adjustment of the part of the appliance which caused the injury, and the master maintained a thorough and adequate system of constant inspection, and the defect was not known to any of the persons engaged in that inspection, no action can be maintained. Mensch v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1892) 150 Pa. 598, 17 L. R. A. 450, 25 At. 31.

In Cregan v. Marston (1891) 128 N. Y. 568, 27 N. E. 952, the court, in discussing the charge of the trial judge that it was the duty of the master to the servants to watch the use of the defective rope by them, and its changes of condition, that the engineer was his agent and deputy for such purpose, and that the negligence of the engineer, if it existed, was that of the master, said: "The doctrine at once renders unexplainable all the line of cases in which some defect in a machine has occurred from its use, and the master has been held freed from responsibility if the machine furnished was originally safe, and he neither knew nor ought to have known of the existence of the defect, for it puts the duty of daily watch and discovery on him, and so requires no notice or complaint or lapse of time to put him in default. I think the doctrine asserted was an extension of the master's duty beyond its natural and proper limits. Probably the existing rule was founded upon the truth that certain things essential to the safety of the servants must necessarily, in the management of the business, emanate from the master, and remain in his absolute control; and so the servants should not be responsible to one another for defects which they could not repair for lack both of authority and means. The servants cannot furnish the machines. That is the master's right and duty, but the servant who uses them can and should keep them in order for their proper and safe daily use, when furnished with the necessary means of so doing, and when perfectly capable of correcting the defect. It is undoubtedly true, as we have often said, that it is the duty of the master to keep a machine or appliance in order, and that he cannot delegate the duty so as to escape responsibility. But that is a general rule, and has its qualifications and limitations. One of those is that it is not the master's duty to repair defects arising in the daily use of the appliance, for which proper and suitable materials are supplied, and which may easily be remedied by the workmen, and are not of a permanent character, or requiring the help of skilled mechanics. . . . The cases cited, and their doctrine, appear to be founded upon what is determined to be the implied contract relation between the master and servant. Their mutual duties grow out of that relation, and change and vary as it is changed or varied by the facts which indicate and measure it. Where those facts show that, in the understanding of both parties, a class of ordinary repairs are to be made by the servants with materials furnished by the master for that express purpose; that they and he regard it as a detail of their own work; that it is something entirely within their capacity, and not dependent upon the skill of a special expert; and that the necessity springs from their daily use of the appliance, occurs at different and unknown periods in their service, and is open to their observation in the absence of the master,—the inference is inevitable that the contract relation between the parties makes it a duty of the servants and a detail of their work to correct the defect when it arises with the materials furnished."

"The master's duty is fully performed when he 'supplies adequate machinery with all the appliances necessary and desirable for adaptation to some particular purpose, even though the same becomes temporarily impaired by reason of constant use, when the impairment is of such a character as to be easily and readily remedied by the servant, a part of whose duty it is to attend to such matters.'" Yaw v. Whitmore (1899) 46 App. Div. 422, 61 N. Y. Supp. 731. This distinction is predicated, to some extent, upon the fact that a smaller amount of technical skill and knowledge is, in most cases, required for what are termed by the court ordinary repairs than for those of a more permanent character.

In many kinds of service the care and keeping of tools and machinery in a condition of safety require merely the attention and repairs occasioned by ordinary use and wear, and are properly a part of the regular business of the servant engaged in the use of such tools and machinery. In such cases the duty of the employer is performed by furnishing safe tools and machinery and the means of making needed repairs, and the duty of making repairs may be intrusted to servants, and any neglect in the performance of this service is the negligence of a servant. McGee v. Boston Cordage Co. 54 L. R. A.

(1865) 139 Mass. 445, 1 N. E. 745. But in cases where skill and practical knowledge are required in keeping machinery in a reasonable condition as to safety, beyond what is needed in operating it, it is the duty of the employer to supply the necessary intelligence, skill, and experience in the care and inspection of the machinery to protect the servant from injury; and for any failure to exercise proper care and skill the employer is accountable. Jaques v. Great Falls Mfg. Co. (1891) 66 N. H. 482, 13 L. R. A. 824, 20 Atl. 552. See also the quotations from Cregan v. Marston (1891) 126 N. Y. 568, 27 N. E. 962, supra, and from Smith v. Potter (1881) 46 Mich. 458, 41 Am. Rep. 161, 9 N. W. 278, in VII. b, 3, infra.

This conception is apparently the basis of the doctrine laid down in Arkansas, that the boundary line between liability and nonliability is to be drawn with reference to the distinction between the higher officials exercising a general supervision over the instrumentalities with a view to keeping them in proper condition and the subordinate employees by whom incidental repairs are carried out. See the decisions from this state cited in VII. b, 2, infra.

In the subjoined paragraphs are tabulated, under headings adapted to facilitate comparison and contrast with former subdivisions of this note, a number of cases showing what repairs the courts regard as permanent or as ordinary.

1. Inspection and repair of railway tracks.

In Michigan C. R. Co. v. Austin (1879) 40 Mich. 247, a railway company was held not to be liable for the failure of trackmen in not removing ashes and cinders, the decision being afterwards said, in Balhoff v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1895) 106 Mich. 606, 65 N. W. 592, to rest on the ground that the condition of unsafety was temporary, resulting from an omission, which pertained merely to the operation of the road, where trackmen were held to be vice principals as regards their failure to level the track. To the same effect is Anderson v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1895) 107 Mich. 591, 65 N. W. 585, where it was said that the daily repair of tracks by section-men is not a discharge of a nondelegable duty.

2. Inspection and repair of rolling stock.

The virtual effect of a decision in the circuit court of appeals is to make an engineer a fellow servant of his fireman as regards the inspection of the engine between the regular inspecting stations. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Patton (1894) 9 C. C. A. 487, 23 U. S. App. 319, 61 Fed. 259.

But it is difficult to see how such a doctrine can be reconciled with the Federal decisions cited in III. a, supra, especially Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Mulligan (1895) 14 C. C. A. 547, 34 U. S. App. 1, 67 Fed. 569.

Where plaintiff, a head-end brakeman, while standing on a car in the performance of his duties, was thrown to the ground by reason of the breaking of a link connecting the engine with the car on which he stood, causing the train to stop with a jerk, it was held to be error to instruct that it was the duty of defendant "to keep them [links] in such condition that they should be proper and sufficient for work to be done by them," and "to prevent the use of unsuitable and dangerous links," since defendant's whole duty was performed when it furnished a sufficient supply of suitable links. Miller v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1900) 175 Mass. 363, 56 N. E. 282.

A railroad company is not liable for injuries to a conductor from the turning of a loose step upon the engine, where the engineer was furnished with proper tools for its repair, and the company had no knowledge, actual or constructive, of its condition. Miller v. Chicago, & G. T. R. Co. (1892) 90 Mich. 280, 51 N. W. 370.

A railway company is not liable for the failure of a fellow servant to set apart for repairs a disabled car, as it was his duty to do. Dodge v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1892) 155 Mass. 448, 29 N. E. 1086.

In McDonald v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1895) 108 Mich. 7, 65 N. W. 597, it was held that a railroad company which imposes on its engineers the duty of inspecting their engines, and provides no other method of inspection, to keep them in a reasonably safe condition, is liable to one of its brakemen for an injury received through the failure of the engine to respond promptly to the airbrake, which defect was known to the engineer, who continued to use the engine after knowing of the defect, whether such conduct is considered as a complete neglect of the master's duty of inspection, or the illegal imposition of such duty upon a fellow servant. The court said: "Such inspection, in the ordinary operation of the road, is the act of a fellow servant, as between the engineer and brakeman, and, as between them, does not constitute the engineer a representative of the master. . . . But if the company makes no other provision for inspection, and chooses to rely upon the reports of its men, deferring repairs until breaks occur, or until the operators in due course of business report defects, we must either say that it has neglected the duty of inspection altogether, or that it has imposed one of its duties upon its operatives, and that it does not fall within the limits of fellow service, or that it may avoid the duty which the law imposes by invoking the rule of fellow servants."

It has been laid down that, although a car inspector may not be a fellow servant of a brakeman, yet an instruction which treats all "servants whose duty it is to examine the cars" as not fellow servants of the brakeman is erroneous. Such an instruction is broad enough to cover the negligence, not only of the car inspectors at the various car shops, but also that of conductors and other trainmen who have a like duty to perform, while in charge of the train. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Bragonier (1882) 11 Ill. App. 516. This case was reversed on appeal ([1886] 119 Ill. 51, 7 N. E. 688) but on the altogether different ground that the brakeman was guilty of contributory negligence in not making such an inspection as he should have done.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Rice (1888) 51 Ark. 467, 4 L. R. A. 173, 11 S. W. 699, the court said: "While we recognize the liability of the railway company for the wilful or negligent default of its chief inspectors and those deputed to supervise the condemnation of unsuitable tools, rolling stock, etc., we cannot assent to the proposition that every yard inspector on the line of a railroad is a vice principal." The function of the yard inspector was to inspect cars on their arrival, make trifling repairs, and mark them unfit for use whenever they were seriously damaged.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Gaines (1885) 46 Ark. 555, a car inspector was held to be a fellow servant of a brakeman on the ground that he was not in charge of a separate department, and that his duties did not require special mechanical skill.

In another case it was said that the rule as to the furnishing of appliances and maintaining them in repair is limited in its operation to the agents who are employed to look after and see that these things are done. "We do not mean," said the court, "to determine that this rule would extend to every subaltern who hammers on an engine in the course of repairs; but when the company appoints an agent for a particular purpose, his acts in the line of his specialty are the acts of the company." St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Harper (1884) 44 Ark. 524.

It has also been laid down that where the relation sustained by a car inspector to car repairers is merely that of a foreman directing their labors, he is not a vice principal. Fordyce v. Briney (1893) 58 Ark. 206, 24 S. W. 250.

The negligence of an engineer in running an engine without a headlight, instead of obeying rules requiring him to examine the engine, and, in case of defects, to take it to the repair shop, the consequence being that a flagman at a crossing was killed, is that of a fellow servant. McDonald v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1892) 63 Hun, 587, 18 N. Y. Supp. 609.

A mining company is not liable for the negligence of its foreman in failing to see that the bumpers of a car were in proper repair. Voahakey v. Hillside Coal & I. Co. (1897) 21 App. Div. 168, 47 N. Y. Supp. 386. Here, however, the master's nonliability seems to be asserted in terms too broad, as the court speaks of the fact of the coervice of the injured and delinquent servants as sufficient to prevent recovery.

3. Inspection of rolling stock belonging to other companies.

An inspector of foreign railway cars is a fellow servant of a brakeman engaged in operating them. Mackin v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1883) 135 Mass. 201, 46 Am. Rep. 456; Smith v. Potter (1881) 46 Mich. 238, 41 Am. Rep. 161, 9 N. W. 273; Mexican C. R. Co. v. Shean (1891; Tex.) 18 S. W. 151, Following Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Farmer (1889) 78 Tex. 86, 11 S. W. 156; Kelly v. Abbot (1885) 63 Wis. 307, 309, 53 Am. Rep. 202, 23 N. W. 890.

The special consideration relied on by the court in the Massachusetts case cited, that a system of inspection may be adequate, even though it does not provide for the examination of foreign cars at the points where they are taken into the trains of the employer, is not supported by any satisfactory reasons. The assertion that there is no duty in the premises because the servant knows such a system to be in operation, and therefore assumes the risks incident to it, is a mere petitio principii. The question still remains, whether the circumstances are appropriate for the application of the doctrine of assumed risks. The present writer is strongly of the opinion that this question should be answered in the negative. In the first place the conclusion of the court, that the risks of the system were, as a matter of law, assumed, seems to be justifiable only on the hypothesis that the servant's comprehension of those risks was a peremptory inference either from the plaintiff's opportunities of acquainting himself with the manner in which his own employers carried on their business, or from the generality of the usage which prevails among railway companies to omit the inspection of foreign cars at receiving stations. The omission to advert to these special elements, and to determine their precise significance in relation to the evidence, is of itself a serious flaw in the reasoning of the court. But that reasoning is also deficient in a still more important respect,—that no attempt is made to determine how far the doctrine of assumption of risks ought to be allowed to qualify the operation of the theory of nondelegable duties. As already remarked, that theory has been worked out in Massachusetts in a form somewhat different from that which it has taken in other states. But, under any form which it can take it seems to be essentially incompatible with the acceptance of a doctrine which declares that the servant's knowledge of the general system adopted for the conduct of a department of the business disables him from maintaining damages for an injury caused by some particular defect in the instrumentalities, which is not discovered owing to that system. To hold that the servant assumes the risks of the various abnormal sporadic conditions which may by possibility be superadded temporarily to his environment owing to the known imperfections of the employer's arrangements, is a doctrine which is not only extremely harsh, but which would tend to nullify completely the theory of absolute duties in its relation to perils, in the face of which the servant is unusually helpless, and against which he is therefore in fairness entitled to the fullest measure of protection which the law can afford.

In Smith v. Potter (1881) 46 Mich. 258, 41 Am. Rep. 161, 9 N. W. 273, supra, the court argued thus: "The work done is to be done at all hours and at every place where there are railroad connections with other roads. It is not a duty of management or general supervision, but a task for which nothing is required but fidelity, and mechanical knowledge of a comparatively limited kind. It is such work as would seldom be delegated to an officer of extensive responsibility who has other interests to look after. But, whatever be its quality, it was in this case not claimed to have been placed in wrong hands. Nothing more could be asked of the employer. There is no difference, in the nature of the danger, or in the quality of the inspector's employment, between the case of shifting cars belonging to other roads and cars belonging to the same road. Defects in both lead to the same results, and the methods of examining both are identical. Where a car has been damaged by some injury which has escaped notice, it cannot fairly be said that employers ignorant of it, who have taken all the usual and reasonable precautions against it, are any more to blame in the one case than in the other."

This decision was subsequently explained as having been based on the ground that the delinquent's duty was not one of management or general supervision as in the case before the court. Van Dusen v. Letellier (1889) 78 Mich. 492, 44 N. W. 572 (dock in mill yard not repaired).

In Cincinnati, T. & D. R. Co. v. McMullen (1889) 117 Ind. 439, 20 N. E. 287, the court inclined to the view that inspectors of foreign cars were fellow servants of the brakeman, the view being taken that "it is not the duty of the company to furnish appliances and instrumentalities, but to make proper inspection and give notice of defects if any are found, and that this duty is performed by the employment of a sufficient number of competent and skilful inspectors who are subjected to proper rules and instructions." The defective car in this case belonged to the defendant, and the suggestion as to foreign cars was definitely determined not to embody the true rule in Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Bates (1897) 146 Ind. 564, 45 N. E. 108.

In an intermediate case it was held that a mining company fulfils its duty to its servants as to inspection of cars furnished it for temporary use, by supplying competent and skilful inspectors subjected to proper instructions; and the negligence of noninspection in such case is not that of vice principals. Neutz v. Jackson Hill Coal & Coke Co. (1894) 139 Ind. 411, 38 N. E. 324, Rehearing denied in (1894) 139 Ind. 418, 39 N. E. 147. The court said: "In the present case the inspectors and the appellant occupied a relation to the appellee in all respects identical with that occupied by the inspectors and brakemen of railway companies handling cars of other companies in the course of the master's business. The cars came, not as instruments of the service supplied by the master, but as incidents of its business, and from the dependence of the master upon those not in any manner connected with such business or subject to the master's control. If the defects had been in the original construction of the cars it could not be said that such defects were chargeable to the negligence of the appellee, nor can it be said with greater reason that the ill repair was from the fault of the appellee, or that a duty rested upon the appellee to make the repairs. The extent of the appellee's control over the cars was in the use of them for loading coal, and it was not responsible to the appellant, or anyone else, for their sufficiency as a means of transportation. The failure to inspect, to set brakes, or to block the wheels when the first car was removed was negligence in the use, and not in the supplying, of instrumentalities. One line of distinction between vice principals and co-employees is in the duty, in one instance, to supply or maintain instrumentalities of the service, and in the other of using the instrumentalities supplied. Negligence in the first, though that of a servant, is the master's negligence, while in the second the negligence is that of a fellow servant. This distinction keeps in view the proposition that where the master himself participates in the use, and the negligence is his own, he may not be said to be a fellow servant." This decision was explained in Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Bates (1897) 146 Ind. 564, 45 N. E. 108, supra, as being based on the theory that, as the defective car had been merely delivered to a coal company to be loaded with coal, the liability of the bailee was essentially different from that of railway companies which receive foreign cars to be forwarded.

4. Inspection and repair of other kinds of machinery.

A servant cannot recover who is injured while cleaning a cordage machine by the pushing in of a movable board which was insecurely fastened, the nut which held the button not being tightened. Smith v. Lowell Mfg. Co. (1878) 124 Mass. 114.

A servant employed on a slubber machine in a cotton-mill, whose duty it was to see that the machine was kept running, to take off the full hobbins and put on others, to notify the overseer if she knew that there was anything wrong about the machine, and to see that it was kept clean, and the person whose business it was to keep the machine in repair, were fellow servants. Rice v. King Philip Mills (1887) 144 Mass. 229, 59 Am. Rep. 80, 11 N. E. 101.

The mending of a belt used in transmitting power to machinery, and which is frequently broken, is not the duty of the master. Rozelle v. Rose (1896) 3 App. Div. 132, 39 N. Y. Supp. 363.

An employer is not liable for the death of an employee caused by the breaking of a belt on a machine in charge of a fellow servant to whom the employer delegated the duty of inspection, and to whom other belts were supplied,—especially if the deceased knew that the belt in use was unsafe. Headifen v. Cooper (1893) 6 Misc. 263, 26 N. Y. Supp. 763.

Where the cover of a steam chest was loose because the nuts were not tightly screwed on the bolts, and steam thereby escaped, causing an accident to plaintiff, a brakeman engaged in coupling the engine with a car, and the engineer had all the tools necessary to tighten the bolts, plaintiff cannot recover. Keegan v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1899) 45 App. Div. 629, 64 N. Y. Supp. 595.

A warehouseman is not liable for the death of a fireman in his employ, caused by the fall-ure to test hydrostatically a tubular boiler after removing and replacing the caps, where it is part of the ordinary duty of the engineer to make such test. Beil v. Consolidated Gas, Electric Light, H. & P. Co. (1899) 86 App. Div. 242, 56 N. Y. Supp. 780.

4. Inspection incidental to the details of blasting work.

The danger from "missed shots" being temporary and incident to the work of drilling in a mine, which plaintiff was employed to perform, it is not the duty of the employer to make inspections for missed shots after each explosion. Browne v. King (1900) 40 C. C. A. 545, 100 Fed. 561.

The failure of a foreman to inspect cartridge holes to ascertain whether any charges remain unexploded is that of a mere co-servant. Mancuso v. Cataract Constr. Co. (1895) 87 Hun, 519, 34 N. Y. Supp. 278.

5. Inspection of loads on railway cars.

The inspection of a railway car by a station agent or other employee, with a view to seeing that the load is properly arranged and adjusted, is, as regards the trainmen, the act of a fellow servant merely. In Byrnes v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1889) 113 N. Y. 251, 4 L. R. A. 151, 21 N. E. 50, the court said: "We think the defendant had fulfilled its duty to the servants in its employ when it furnished a perfectly safe car and appliances, and when it also provided a system of inspection of cars and proper persons to inspect them after they were loaded and before they were to be taken away. The failure to inspect, or, if inspection were made, the failure to rectify the improper loading by which the brake was rendered useless, was not the failure of the master to fulfil his duty to his servant, but it was the negligence of a co-servant in carrying out the orders of the master. The master is not an insurer that all his servants shall perform their duty, and he performs his duty to the servant in this regard in providing a system of inspection and intrusting its performance to competent hands. If, thereafter, such servants are guilty of negligence the master is not responsible therefor to a co-servant. We do not see that the question is in any way altered by the fact that the car was loaded by the servants of the owner of the lumber which was placed upon it. Whoever loaded it, the master had provided for an inspection of the car before it was to be taken away, and if the inspection were neglected, it was still the same neglect of a servant of a defendant to do that which he ought to have done, and such neglect was not that of the master in fulfilling any of the duties which he owed as master to his servants. It cannot, we think, be properly contended that the master fails to provide a car which is a safe and proper one, or that he fails to provide one with proper appliances, because through the negligent manner in which the car is loaded the appliance is, on that account only, made useless for the purpose for which it was intended." Ruger, Ch. J., and Andrews and Danforth, JJ., dissented, the latter on the ground that when the car was furnished to deceased it was a loaded, not an empty car, and at that moment the movement of the brake was obstructed, and therefore the car was imperfect and unfit for use.

This case was followed in Ford v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1889) 117 N. Y. 638, 22 N. E. 946, where the employees who had loaded cars were held to be fellow servants of a switchman, who was injured by a piece of timber which fell from one of them, owing to the failure to secure the load with the side stakes furnished. Dan- 54 L. R. A.

forth, J., dissented on the ground that the evidence showed that there were no brackets provided for the reception of stakes, and that the defect was therefore structural. Ruger, Ch. J., and Andrews, J., concurred in this view.

On a subsequent appeal ([1891] 124 N. Y. 493, 12 L. R. A. 454, 28 N. E. 1101), the plaintiff was permitted to recover on the ground that it had not established proper rules prescribing the manner in which cars should be loaded with lumber—a theory not discussed at the first trial. To the same effect, see Bailey v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1898) 27 App. Div. 305, 50 N. Y. Supp. 87; Jarman v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (1893) 98 Mich. 135, 57 N. W. 32 (fireman of another train injured by a projecting limb of a tree on a flat car); Leillis v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1900) 124 Mich. 37, 82 N. W. 828 (piece of timber fell off and injured a switchman); Dewey v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. (1893) 97 Mich. 329, 22 L. R. A. 292, 56 N. W. 756, Reversing on rehearing (1893) 97 Mich. 343, 16 L. R. A. 342, 52 N. W. 942 (McGrath, J., dissenting). At the first hearing of the last-mentioned case the majority had taken the ground that the duty of inspection went to the extent contended for by the plaintiff, and that Smith v. Potter (1881) 46 Mich. 258, 41 Am. Rep. 161, 9 N. W. 273, supra, holding that a car inspector and a brakeman were fellow servants, had been overruled by Irvine v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. (1891) 89 Mich. 419, 50 N. W. 1008, where it was held that it was as much the duty of a railway company to see that the cars are so loaded that brakemen will have reasonably safe access to the brakes as it is to see that proper appliances are provided. The further statement that an inspector, provided in pursuance of the obligation, would be a fellow servant, was thought to be erroneous. Other cases relied upon by the majority of the judges were Van Dusen v. Le-tellier (1889) 78 Mich. 492, 44 N. W. 572, supra, and Morton v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co. (1890) 81 Mich. 423, 46 N. W. 111, where the duty to inspect the parts of cases was held to be non-assignable. The minority drew a distinction between the duty of furnishing a safe place and safe machinery and the duty of seeing that the appliances are properly used, and considered that the duty of seeing that a car is properly loaded came under the latter head. The injury, said Montgomery, J. (see p. 347 of the report), resulted, not from any fault in the appliances used, but because, in making use of suitable cars and machinery, a fellow servant neglected his duty. The view of the minority prevailed upon the subsequent hearing of the case. The court said (see p. 333 of the report): "The real point in controversy here is whether the duty of a master is to be extended so that he may be made liable for the neglect of a car inspector in not observing that a car is improperly loaded when it is to be put into the train for transportation. There is no complaint here about the car itself. It was proper in construction, and a safe car for use in that service. Upon the first argument of the case in this court the real point in controversy was not so fully pointed out and considered as upon the reargument, and the case was regarded as very similar in principle to Smith v. Potter (1881) 46 Mich. 258, 41 Am. Rep. 161, 9 N. W. 273, which Mr. Justice McGrath considered as virtually overruled by the later cases cited above. There is, however, a broad distinction between Smith v. Potter and the present case. In the former case, the injury complained of was received by reason of a defect in the frame work of the car itself, while here the accident is attributable to improper loading. In the later decisions the doctrine of Smith v. Potter has been doubted, and the rule broadly stated that the master must furnish to the servant a safe place to work, and safe appliances to work with.

But, in regard to the proper loading of cars, quite a different rule must necessarily prevail. The master must undoubtedly exercise care in the selection of inspectors to see that cars are not improperly loaded or overburdened, so that they are dangerous to employees, but, after this has been done, it cannot be claimed that the master is to be held responsible for the faithful performance of the inspectors' duty. Any other rule than this would make railroad companies insurers of the lives and limbs of employees. In the present case the projection of the lumber over the end of the car was as apparent to the brakeman, if he had taken the precaution to make observation, as to an inspector. It requires no special skill or training to ascertain the fact. The duties of a brakeman are known to be dangerous, and when one enters such service he must be held to have assumed the risks of the employment. He must exercise care himself in going between moving cars to make couplings." The opinion at the first hearing, which was thus reversed, was written by McGrath, J., who also composed an elaborate dissenting opinion after the second hearing. Some extracts from the latter may with advantage be given to indicate the arguments adduced to support the view which was finally rejected. The learned judge said: "The duty of inspecting the car itself, and that of the inspection of its condition with its load upon it, have a common origin. Both spring from the duty of protection which the master owes to the servant. There is no ground for saying that one of these duties may be delegated so as to relieve the master from all liability, and that the other may not; nor is there reason in saying that the person who inspects the car itself, its appliances, and instrumentalities with reference to the safety of those engaged in its transportation, is not a fellow servant, while he who inspects the loaded car for a like purpose, and to see whether it affords proper facilities for the performance of the duties which must necessarily be performed in its transportation, is a fellow servant. In the present case both duties were delegated to the same person, both are performed with reference to the same end, and the person to whom delegated must be held in the performance of each to occupy the same relation to plaintiff and defendant. It certainly cannot be said that, with reference to stationed machinery, belting, shafting, and gearing, the master must, at his peril, provide the necessary guards and coverings, and arrange the surroundings so as to render the place reasonably safe, yet, as to a train of cars, between which a brakeman is required in the ordinary discharge of his duties to go while one section is being driven against a standing section or car so loaded as to render the position of the brakeman one of greatly increased hazard to life or limb, the master may, in case of injury, escape liability. The employment is at best a dangerous one. It is as essential to the protection of the brakeman that these spaces be kept clear as that the spaces be provided. This danger can be guarded against. As is said by Mr. Justice Long in Palmer v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1891) 87 Mich. 290, 49 N. W. 618: 'In all cases where the danger can be readily guarded against, the employer is in duty bound to protect the employee at his peril.'"

Where a hand car as originally furnished is in proper condition for use, an accident happening afterwards because of its defective condition must be due to the negligence of the workmen using the car, and these are the fellow servants of their foremen. Reynolds v. Kneeland (1892) 63 Hun, 283, 17 N. Y. Supp. 895. 54 L. R. A.

c. Master liable where the delinquent servant was engaged in a different class of work.

One material limitation to which the doctrine thus laid down is subject is that where the duty of inspecting and repairing appliances is cast upon an employee not actually engaged in the work which the plaintiff is doing, such employee is a vice principal. Nord Deutscher Lloyd S. S. Co. v. Ingebregsten (1894) 57 N. J. L. 400. 81 Atl. 619; Judson v. Olean (1889) 116 N. Y. 655, 22 N. E. 565.

In Woods v. Long Island R. Co. (1896) 11 App. Div. 16, 42 N. Y. Supp. 140, the court, after citing several cases, said: "Tested by these authorities, I think that the controlling consideration in the solution of the question before us must be the method in which the operation and business of the railroad was conducted. If it were part of the duty of the train hands to make the adjustment of the brake rods, then I should say that the car furnished in this case was not defective, and that the failure to properly adjust the rod was the negligence of a fellow servant in the conduct of the work. But if the duty of the train hands was only to operate the brakes, and the duty of adjusting them was imposed on another department, which repaired them and constructed or repaired the appliances of the road generally, then I should say that the car, as furnished, was a defective appliance. If it was the course of business that the car should be furnished with brakes in condition for use by the train hands, I cannot see why the improper adjustment of the parts would not make the appliance defective in the same sense and to the same extent as if some part of the appliance was defective in character or was wanting. In the case before us the evidence as to the operation of the railroad in these respects is meagre. But there was no evidence given on the trial, nor was there any claim made on the argument, that the train hands had any duty with regard to the adjustment of the brake rods. The rules of the company would seem to negative such a claim, for the rules require the conductors to report at their trains, and inspect the signals and brakes to see that they are in proper order, but no duty is devolved upon them of remedying any defects. It further appears that it is the duty of the inspectors in the yards to inspect these appliances and to see that they are repaired or put in proper order. We are therefore of the opinion that the character of the car, as an appliance, must be determined as of the time when it was furnished to the train hands, and that any failure on the part of mechanics or employees up to that time must be deemed neglect in the master's duty of furnishing a safe appliance, and not as that of a fellow servant in the conduct of the work."

The improper adjustment of a brake rod constitutes a defective appliance, and not a mere neglect or failure in detail, within the rule relating to the liability of the master for defects in appliance, where it was the duty of inspectors, and not of the train employees, to make the adjustment. Woods v. Long Island R. Co. (1896) 11 App. Div. 16, 42 N. Y. Supp. 140. See also Daley v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1888) 147 Mass. 101, 16 N. E. 690, cited in III. 2, supra.

d. Negligence in failing to replace an unsound by a sound appliance; when master not liable for.

The result of the general principles discussed in IV. 2, V. 2, supra, is that the master cannot be held liable where the substitution of a sound for an unsound appliance is susceptible of being effected by merely selecting another instrumentality from a stock furnished by the master. In other words, the quality of the operation through which the substitution is carried out determines the quality of the whole transaction, as being the discharge of the functions of a mere servant.

A master employing a servant to keep tools in repair, or replace them with others, is not liable for injury to a coservant through using a tool after it had become dull on account of the neglect of the servant to replace it with another. Webber v. Piper (1888) 109 N. Y. 496, 17 N. E. 216. The court said: "The master's duty was performed when he furnished suitable saws and the means and conveniences for keeping them sharp and properly set. The saw, though dull, was not defective in any legal sense, and the negligence, if any, was that of Myers, whose duty in sharpening and setting the saws was that of a fellow servant. A contrary rule might carry us to the extent of saying that, where the master furnished sufficient and adequate machinery, but its running became dangerous to the operative, unless well oiled, . . . he was liable for the neglect or omission of that servant. There are many matters of detail in the management of safe and adequate machinery, which must be intrusted to the operatives, and as to which the master owes no duty except the employment of competent workmen, and we deem this a case of that character. The line of division between the duty of the master to furnish and maintain safe and adequate machinery, and that of the operative to manage and handle it with prudence and care, is difficult to define by any general description but it is quite obvious when each case, as it arises, comes under consideration. In the one before us the neglect, if any, was in a detail of the management of the machinery. A master builder might furnish proper tools to his workmen, but it would not be his duty to sharpen every chisel as it became dull, or set every saw when that need arose. The appellant relies upon the case of Kain v. Smith (1882) 89 N. Y. 375. If, in that case, the master had furnished another jigger, perfect in all respects, and safe and adequate for use, and the neglect had been that the foreman used the old one, which had become unsafe, when he might have used the new one, a very different case would have been presented. Here the master supplied saws enough and the means of sharpening and resetting, and if the servants neglected to avail themselves of the means of safety provided, the master was not in fault, for the saw was not defective, but merely dull from use. Its ordinary efficiency was impaired, but it had not thereby become a defective or dangerous machine."

In Cregan v. Marston (1891) 126 N. Y. 568, 27 N. E. 952, Reversing (1890) 32 N. Y. S. R. 913, 10 N. Y. Supp. 681, it was held that a master was not liable for the failure of an engineer in charge of hoisting machinery to replace old ropes with new ones out of a stock which was kept on hand.

An employer is not liable for an injury sustained by an employee while working near a derrick managed by a fellow servant because of the breaking of a rope, where a new rope was there ready for use if the workmen chose to use it, and also a tackle which could have been used instead of the single rope, if desired. McKinnon v. Norcross (1889) 148 Mass. 533, 3 L. R. A. 320, 20 N. E. 183. The court said: "Properly to use pulleys, blocks, ropes, and other ordinary tools and appliances which have been furnished by a master to the workmen employed upon a derrick is a part of the duty of the workmen. It is incidental to the management and use of the derrick." To the same effect, see Conway v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1895) 13 Misc. 53, 34 N. Y. Supp. 113, Reversing (1890) 11 54 L. R. A.

Misc. 641, 32 N. Y. Supp. 921; Daley v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1888) 147 Mass. 101, 16 N. E. 690; Johnson v. Boston Tow-Boat Co. (1888) 135 Mass. 209, 46 Am. Rep. 458,—in all of which a sufficient stock of rope was kept on hand by the master, and a new one might have been obtained at any time. In the last-mentioned of these cases W. Allen, J., thus attempts to reconcile the decision with the doctrine laid down in Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1872) 110 Mass. 240, 14 Am. Rep. 598: "It was incidental to the use of the apparatus—a part of its contemplated use—that the rope should be occasionally renewed; and when the defendant had furnished the means for that renewal, and employed Moore to make the renewal whenever needed, it employed him as a servant, and not as an agent or deputy. When a master has furnished suitable structures, means, and appliances for the prosecution of a business, all persons employed by him in carrying on the business by use of the means furnished, including those who use the means directly in the prosecution of the business, those who maintain them in a condition to be used, and those who adapt them to use by new appliances and adaptations incidental to their use, are fellow servants in the general employment and business. One employed in the care, supervision, and keeping in ordinary repair of the means and appliances used in a business is engaged in the common service."

An employer is not liable for an injury to an employee as for failure to furnish safe tools and appliances, because the bar used when one of the employees was injured was more liable to turn than that generally used, where the accident was due to the use of it without blocks, which were available at any time. Hathaway v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1894) 92 Iowa, 337, 60 N. W. 651.

There can be no recovery where a fellow servant selected a defective wheel for the purpose of replacing one which formed part of an appliance for conveying loads along an overhead wire. Byrne v. Eastmans Co. (1898) 27 App. Div. 270, 50 N. Y. Supp. 457.

The failure of an engineer, who, by the rules of the company, is required to keep his engine, including the head lamp, in order, to replace a short wick by one of suitable length from a supply furnished by the company at a convenient place, is not negligence which is imputable to the master. Simpson v. Central Vermont R. Co. (1896) 5 App. Div. 614, 39 N. Y. Supp. 464.

e. All employees engaged in repairing regarded as coservants of each other.

In the cases so far reviewed the injured servant himself had nothing to do with the work of repairing. Another principle equally fatal to an injured servant's right to maintain the action comes into play where both he and the delinquent coservant were engaged in the work of repairing. Under such circumstances it is held that, being engaged in the same kind of work, they assume the risks of one another's negligence.

In Murphy v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1882) 88 N. Y. 146, 42 Am. Rep. 240, it was held that a railway company was not liable for the death of a mechanic in its repair shop, where the cause of the disaster was the explosion of a boiler due to the negligent failure of his coemployees at the last stage of the repairs to discover and repair defects in the boiler which had been overlooked at a previous stage of the repairs by other employees. The court said: "We think this case is not within the principle which holds the master responsible for unsafe machinery furnished for the use of the servant. The case of Fuller v. Jewett (1880) 80 N. Y. 46, 86 Am. Rep. 575, is a distinct authority for the proposition that, if this locomotive had been sent out from the shop, and afterwards exploded while in use on the defendant's road, injuring the engineer or other servants of the defendant, the company would have been responsible. The negligence of the boiler makers in the case supposed would be regarded as the negligence of the master. The risk of the negligence of the repairers and machinists would not be considered one of the risks which a servant in whose hands the machine was subsequently placed for use, had assumed. The placing of the locomotive on the road for use would be an assurance that it was fit and safe; and an engineer, or other servant employed on the train, could not be supposed to have known the condition of the locomotive, or whether the men employed to make repairs were competent, or the manner in which the work had been done. In this case Murphy was not, we think, a servant, in whose hands the locomotive was placed by the defendant for use, within the principle of Fuller v. Jewett, and like cases. The locomotive was sent to the repair shop in order that it might be made fit for use. The mechanics in the repair shop, including the intestate, were employed for the purpose of repairing defective locomotives. The intestate and his collaborators in the shop were engaged in the same department of service, worked under the same control, and in the case in question the boiler makers and the other mechanics were employed to effect the same object, viz.: the reparation of the 'Sacramento.' It is true that the work was done in successive stages, and different parts of the work were intrusted to different persons. The refitting of the valve and its adjustment to the required pressure were the last things to be done. This work was, however, as necessary in fitting the locomotive for use as the work of the boiler makers or machinists. The intestate had an opportunity to inform himself of the competency of his co-servants in the shop. He doubtless supposed that the boiler makers had performed their duty; unfortunately they had neglected it. But we think the risk of their negligence was one of the risks he assumed, as incident to his employment in the common service. It would be too close a construction to hold that the repairs were completed when his work commenced, and that the setting of the valve was an independent and disconnected service in respect to a machine put into his hands by the company for use. This claim of the plaintiff's counsel would make the master responsible to each successive employee engaged on the repairs for any negligence of a coemployee whose work was prior in point of time, although done in effecting the common purpose in which all were engaged. This would, we think, be extending the liability of the master further than is warranted by the adjudged cases."

To the same effect are the following cases:

A servant in a shop who had repaired a chain used in raising locomotive driving wheels, and another servant, who, in so using the chain, is injured by its breaking at the link which had been repaired, are fellow servants. Rogers Locomotive & Mach. Works v. Hand (1888) 50 N. J. L. 464, 14 Atl. 766.

Plaintiff's intestate, a timekeeper at defendant's paper mill, was killed by the bursting of a tee in a steam pipe, occasioned by the action of the superintendent of the mill in opening a valve while testing some new steam pipes. The superintendent was a mill wright, and had general charge of defendant's machinery. It was held that the act of the superintendent in opening the valve was, as matter of law, the act of a co-servant, and not of the defendant. Meeker 54 L. R. A.

v. C. R. Remington & Son Co. (1900) 53 App. Div. 592, 85 N. Y. Supp. 1116 (injuries inflicted while the work of inspection is in progress were distinguished from those due to conditions resulting from a faulty inspection).

The wife of a section man cannot recover from a railroad company for the death of her husband who was swept from defendant's tracks into a river by a landslide, where the slide was caused by the failure of the crew, of which her husband was a member, to properly drain a bluff overhanging the track, where such duty was imposed on them by the rules of the company, as such failure is the negligence of fellow servants. Slavens v. Northern P. R. Co. (1899) 38 C. C. A. 151, 97 Fed. 255.

That all servants engaged in repairing a railroad track are in a common employment, see also Wellman v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (1892) 21 Or. 530, 28 Pac. 625.

A railway brakeman, a part of whose duty it is to inspect the brakes which he is to operate, at every station where the train stops, is a fellow servant of a car inspector whose duty it is to inspect the brakes before the train leaves its starting point, and cannot recover for an injury due to a defect in the brake which the latter negligently failed to discover. Eaton v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1897) 14 App. Div. 20, 43 N. Y. Supp. 666. The court remarked that, upon the general question whether car inspectors and brakemen are fellow servants, the authorities do not agree; but that, at all events, they did not reach the case at bar, as in none of them did it appear that inspection was a duty imposed on the brakemen as well as the inspectors.

A foreman of a gang of car repairers in assisting in making repairs acts as their fellow servant. Holts v. Great Northern R. Co. (1897) 69 Minn. 524, 72 N. W. 805. See also Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Meyers (1896) 22 C. C. A. 268, 46 U. S. App. 226, 76 Fed. 443, the effect of which is stated in V. o. 1, supra.

A switchman employed to shift cars in a railroad yard according to directions upon a card furnished him by the yard despatcher, whose duty it is to order all cars marked by the car inspector as out of repair sent to the repair shop, is a fellow servant of such inspector. Gibson v. Northern C. R. Co. (1880) 22 Hun, 289. The court relied upon the principle that the two servants were "engaged in a common enterprise." But the decision is of doubtful correctness, as the plaintiff had nothing to do with the work of inspection, and his action should apparently have been sustained under the theory embodied in Fuller v. Jewett, as explained in Murphy v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1882) 88 N. Y. 140, 42 Am. Rep. 240, supra.

VIII. Doctrine as to the details of work not a protection to the master when his own negligence or that of a vice principal was an efficient cause of the injury.

a. Master liable where he or his vice principal directed the details of the work.

It is evident that there is no room for the application of the doctrine explained in the last four subtitles, if the details of the work were superintended by the master himself, or one of those employees who are deemed to be vice principals by virtue of their rank. That superintendence is an official act of a vice principal, see note to O'Neil v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900) 51 L. R. A. pp. 590 et seq. Under such circumstances his negligence must, at all events, be one of the efficient causes, and, in most cases, will probably be the sole efficient cause, of the injury.

An employer who fails to furnish safe and suitable lumber for the construction of a staging by the employees for use in their work, and who especially directs the use of a stringer in a specified place, is liable for an injury to an employee caused by the breaking of such stringer. Stanwick v. Butler-Ryan Co. (1896) 98 Wis. 430, 67 N. W. 723.

An employer is liable, where he instructs his employees to build horses, for a scaffold to be used by the workmen in the house he is constructing, from certain particular material, of which there is just enough for that purpose, and an employee is injured by the breaking of a horse made of defective material, the defect not being apparent to an ordinary observer. Brown v. Todd (1900) 46 App. Div. 546, 61 N. Y. Supp. 963. The theory of the case was that the selection of the material was not left to the servants themselves, and that the express direction by the master as to the material to be used cast the responsibility upon him.

That a railway company would be liable if a heap of sand which caused an injury had been deposited beside its track by its direct order was conceded, in Robinson v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. (1877) 46 Tex. 540.

A specific direction by the master or a vice principal to place a gas pipe in a position where it may be dangerous to a servant will render the master liable for an injury caused by it. But a general order which merely mentions the points between which the pipe is to run will not affect him with liability for the negligence of the servants who carry out the order in placing it so that another servant receives an injury by coming into collision with it. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Bell (1886) 112 Pa. 400, 4 Atl. 50.

A railway company fails to discharge its duty to furnish a safe place to work where a foreman of car repairers places a car to be repaired so near the switch leading to the repair track that it is liable to be struck by moving cars on the adjoining track. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Holman (1895) 155 Ill. 21, 39 N. E. 573.

A master is responsible for the safety of a framework constructed under his own supervision for the purpose of lowering a heavy article. Bradbury v. Goodwin (1886) 108 Ind. 258, 9 N. E. 302.

The point that a work train which injured a trackman owing to its being run without lights was run in accordance with the regulations of the company, and that the injury was therefore the act of the company, cannot be taken on appeal, unless it was suggested to the trial court. Coon v. Syracuse & U. R. Co. (1851) 5 N. Y. 492.

In many cases where recovery has been denied, the fact that there was no authority to do the particular act which caused the injury is mentioned as one of the grounds of the decision. See, for example, Cowan v. Umbagog Pulp Co. (1897) 91 Me. 26, 39 Atl. 340; Karl v. Mallard (1858) 3 Bosw. 591. Compare, also, the cases in which the delinquency consists in using the instrumentalities in a manner not contemplated by the master (V. k. supra), or in disobeying his express orders (VI. a. supra).

b. Master liable where his own negligence interferes as a proximate cause between a delinquent coservant's negligence and the injury.

It is also manifest, both on principle and authority, that this doctrine is no protection to the master, where he might, by the exercise of reasonable care, have secured the plaintiff from exposure to the dangerous conditions created by 54 L. R. A.

the delinquent coservant's negligence. That is to say, his own subsequent breach of duty is, in law, regarded as the proximate cause of the injury, if he had actual or constructive notice of the abnormal peril introduced into the plaintiff's environment by the careless performance of the details of the work, and failed to take such steps as a prudent man would have taken, —whether by warning the persons whose safety was affected by the existence of peril (Stourbridge v. Brooklyn City R. Co. [1896] 9 App. Div. 129, 41 N. Y. Supp. 128), or by so altering the physical conditions as to remove the peril.

If a part of the road should become unsafe because of the neglect of such employee to make repairs, and should so continue for a length of time sufficient to induce the presumption that the company knew of it, or ought to have known of it, then it is negligent and careless, and is liable to other employees for injuries resulting therefrom. Howd v. Mississippi C. R. Co. (1874) 50 Miss. 178.

Where it appears that an employee, having general charge of the tracks of a railroad company, had notice that an accident had previously occurred where the plaintiff, a brakeman, was injured, it is error to give instructions implying that the company is not liable on the ground that the neglect to repair the track was that of the section foreman, a fellow servant of the plaintiff. Such an instruction fails to take into account the possibility of the injury being due to the company's breach of its nonassignable duties of inspecting its track, and repairing it after notice that it is defective. Anderson v. Michigan C. R. R. Co. (1895) 107 Mich. 591, 65 N. W. 585.

A railway company is liable if it has improperly suffered a deposit of sand to remain near the track, if the fact of its being there was, or ought to have been, known to the corporate agents. Robinson v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. (1877) 46 Tex. 540 (conceded).

The fact that it was the plaintiff's fellow servants who erected a derrick so close to a railway track as to produce a dangerous obstruction if it fell, will not excuse the company for injuries due to its falling, if it has suffered the apparatus to remain standing for an unreasonable length of time. Holden v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1880) 129 Mass. 268, 37 Am. Rep. 843.

A railway company may be held liable if a pile of ashes has been left on the track so long that the higher officials are chargeable with knowledge of the conditions. Hughes v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. (1880) 27 Minn. 137, 6 N. W. 553 (evidence held not to justify inference of knowledge).

A railway company which ought to have known of the defective condition of a plank crossing is not excused by the fact that it had furnished the section foreman with materials, and instructed him to make repairs. Fuhrer v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1899) 121 Mich. 212, 80 N. W. 23.

A railway company is liable for injuries caused by defects in a bridge which it failed to repair after being notified of their existence. Mansfield Coal & Coke Co. v. McEnery (1879) 91 Pa. 185, 36 Am. Rep. 662.

The fact that the improper adjustment of a brake-rod, after loading a car, was due to the negligence of a coservant, will not excuse the company where there was afterwards an ample opportunity for inspection. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Templeton (1894) 87 Tex. 42, 26 S. W. 1066.

A laborer injured by the fall of a steel ingot from a mass of such ingots, carelessly piled by his coservants, can recover of the employer if the master or his agents knew of the dangerous condition of the pile. Nash v. Nashua Iron & Steel Co. (1882) 82 N. H. 406.

An employer whose duty to an employee engaged in dressing stone in his stone yard requires him to place the stone on a solid and steady surface, secure and safe to work upon and about, cannot escape liability for an injury to the employee, caused by the falling upon him of a stone next to that upon which he is working, negligently set upon its edge, on the ground that the omission occurred through the fault of a fellow servant. Blondin v. Oolitic Quarry Co. (1894) 11 Ind. App. 395, 37 N. E. 812. It was considered that "the stone which was shown to have been insecurely placed, and negligently suffered to remain in that condition, in close proximity to where the appellant was at work, was as much a part of the place where such work was being done as would have been a dangerous pitfall of which the appellant had not been apprised."

In The Frank and Willie (1891) 45 Fed. 494, the evidence showed that the mate, after notice of the dangerous condition of a pile of lumber, which his own unskillfulness or negligence had brought about, and after complaint made at least an hour before the accident, refused to take the usual precautions to make the pile safe, and, in effect, required the libellant to continue work in this dangerous situation. The court said: "This was breach of a duty owed by the ship and owners to the seaman, for which the ship and owners are liable. . . . The master was absent and the mate was not only temporarily in command, but, as mate, he was the officer having charge in unloading the cargo,—the representative of the ship and owners in the supervision of that work. His attention was specially called to the dangerous situation, its correction was requested, and the libellant was practically helpless. I do not hold the ship liable for the mate's mere negligence as a fellow workman in producing the dangerous situation, but for his refusal to remedy it when complaint was made, and the danger pointed out to him."

The negligence of a fellow servant in using insufficient material for, or in putting up, a scaffold, from the falling of which a carpenter sustained injury, will not defeat a recovery, if the employer or his superior servant having charge of the construction of the scaffold was informed that it was not safe. Davies v. Griffith (1892) 27 Ohio L. J. 180.

In Neveu v. Sears (1892) 155 Mass. 303, 29 N. E. 472, it was held that one sued for personal injuries to a stone mason in his employ, caused by the explosion of dynamite left unexploded in a block of stone which plaintiff was dressing, is chargeable with knowledge of those facts as to the use of dynamite at his quarry which he either knew or ought to have known. His employment of competent quarrymen, and his furnishing them with proper means of preventing any dangers consequent on the use of dynamite, would not, it was said, justify him in relying on his actual want of knowledge that there had been carelessness at the quarry as an excuse for furnishing a dangerous stone for the plaintiff's use, if, knowing all that had happened at the quarry, he would then have had reason to believe that unexploded cartridges might remain in the blocks removed therefrom. An instruction was therefore held correct which left the jury to say whether, considering the knowledge which the master had, or ought to have had, of what occurred at the quarry, each block should have been examined for dynamite when it was transported from the quarry or first appropriated for the work on which the plaintiff was engaged.

Mass. 297, 10 L. R. A. 769, 26 N. E. 864, there was evidence that a jaw strap had been gone for some time, from which it might be inferred that the company knew of its absence, an inference which would justify a finding that the company ordered the plaintiff into a place where there was a concealed danger known to the company, and not known to the plaintiff or to the superior servant giving the order, and of which the plaintiff received no warning. The court said: "We do not put our decision on the identification of master and servant, and a union of the knowledge of the corporation and the command of the conductor in one person, by a fiction. But we think the jury might have found, at least, this negligence on the part of the corporation;—that, knowing the condition of the car, it put a conductor there with men under him having reasonable ground to anticipate that such orders would be given as were given without warning either to him or the men."

The fact that the floor in a mill has been in a dangerous condition for three hours, by reason of grease left thereon by employees in the mill, is insufficient to charge the master with notice of the defect, so as to render him liable for failure to furnish safe premises. Burke v. National India Rubber Co. (1899) 21 R. I. 446, 44 Atl. 307.

The owners of a brewery are liable for an injury to an employee caused by the fall of a beer keg through a run in which the kegs were lowered into the cellar, resulting from the rivet holes in the rods and brackets of the run becoming enlarged by use and rust, where the defect could have been discovered by a proper examination, and the employee was free from contributory negligence. Mayer v. Liebmann (1897) 16 App. Div. 54, 44 N. Y. Supp. 1067. (The defendant's contention was that the defect was one arising in the daily use of the run.)

A mining company is not relieved from liability for an injury to one of its employees, caused by its negligence in failing to keep the roof of the mine in a reasonably safe condition, although the negligence of a fellow servant to perform the duties assigned to him in that regard contributed to the injury. Island Coal Co. v. Risher (1895) 13 Ind. App. 98, 40 N. E. 158, declaring that, in view of a finding that both the defendant and a mine boss had long known that the roof was unsafe, the question whether the boss was a vice principal or a mere fellow servant was immaterial. See also Rogers v. Leyden (1890) 127 Ind. 50, 26 N. E. 210 (failure after notice of conditions to secure the roof of a mine, the unsafety of which was due to the negligence of the mine boss); Lehigh Valley Coal Co. v. Warrek (1898) 28 C. C. A. 540, 55 U. S. App. 437, 34 Fed. 866; Miller v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (1892) 90 Mich. 230, 51 N. W. 370; Dodge v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1892) 155 Mass. 448, 29 N. E. 1086; Adasken v. Gilbert (1896) 165 Mass. 443, 43 N. E. 199; White v. Eldlits (1897) 19 App. Div. 256, 46 N. Y. Supp. 184; Cowan v. Umbagog Pulp Co. (1897) 91 Me. 26, 39 Atl. 340.

In Bryant v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1894) 81 Hun, 164, 30 N. Y. Supp. 737, the material elements discussed were the engineer's violation of rule as to speed at switches and the company's knowledge of habitual violation of such rule, and failure to take appropriate precautions. The actual decision was that the company was not negligent.

A nonsuit is erroneous where plaintiff offered to prove that defendant knew of the insecurity of the place of work caused by the coservant's negligence. Mullin v. California Horseshoe Co. (1894) 105 Cal. 77, 38 Pac. 585. See, generally, the note to Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines (1898; Mich.) 41 L. R. A. 83.

c. Master liable where his own antecedent negligence and a subsequent delinquency of a co-servant are both efficient causes of the injury.

The rule exemplified in a third class of cases is that, in order to enable the master to defeat a servant's action on the ground that the injurious negligence was committed in carrying out the details of the work, it must appear that no antecedent breach of duty on his part contributed as a proximate cause to the injury.

Where an employee is injured while engaged in an unusually dangerous service (here the repairing of cars), there is always a preliminary question to be settled, viz., whether the master has used "all reasonable and necessary means to protect him against any superadded danger that might be reasonably expected to arise from extrinsic causes." Missouri P. R. Co. v. Watts (1885) 63 Tex. 549.

In many of the cases cited in the preceding subtitles this rule is adverted to under what may be called its negative aspect, the courts merely stating in the course of their arguments that the evidence did not show any such ground of liability. For instances of this incidental recognition of the rule with respect to the hiring of competent servants, see Hall v. Johnson (1865) 3 Hurst. & C. 589, 34 N. J. Exch. N. S. 222, 11 Jur. N. S. 180, 11 L. T. N. S. 779, 18 Week. Rep. 411; McCarthy v. Bristol Shipowners' Co. (1883) 1r. L. R. 10 C. L. 384; Colton v. Richards (1878) 123 Mass. 484; Durst v. Carnegie Steel Co. (1896) 173 Pa. 162, 38 Atl. 1102; Crawford v. Stewart (1887; Pa.) 6 Cent. Rep. 140, 8 Atl. 5; Benn v. Null (1884) 65 Iowa, 407, 21 N. W. 700; Brady v. Norcross (1899) 172 Mass. 331, 52 N. E. 528.

The fact that he did not fail to supply a sufficient amount of materials for the preparation of the instrumentalities, supposing this to be the limit of his obligation, is referred to in Kimmer v. Weber (1897) 151 N. Y. 417, 45 N. E. 860; McCone v. Gallagher (1897) 16 App. Div. 272, 33 N. Y. Supp. 697; Crawford v. Stewart 1887; Pa.) 6 Cent. Rep. 140, 8 Atl. 5; Kelley v. Norcross (1877) 121 Mass. 508; Brady v. Norcross (1899) 172 Mass. 331, 52 N. E. 528; Donnelly v. Brown (1887) 43 Hun, 470.

In Ross v. Walker (1891) 189 Pa. 42, 21 Atl. 157, 159, the court said: "It was the duty of Walker, as employer or principal, to provide the men employed to build this bridge with suitable machinery and appliances; to furnish materials sufficient in quantity and suitable in character; to employ men who were reasonably competent to do the work for which they were wanted, and to give them the benefit of the services of a reasonably competent foreman. All this, as we understand the evidence, was done. If so, the employer had filled the measure of his legal liability to his workmen."

In its positive form the rule has been enunciated in various ways. The following subjoined statements will serve as sufficient examples of the phraseology employed:

If the negligence of the master contributed to, it must necessarily have been an immediate cause of, the accident, and it is no defense that another was likewise guilty of wrong. Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Cummings (1882) 108 U. S. 700, 27 L. ed. 266, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 498.

Negligence of a servant does not excuse the master from liability to a co-servant for an injury which would not have happened had the master performed his duty. Coppings v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1890) 122 N. Y. 557, 25 N. E. 915, Affirming (1888) 48 Hun, 292; Cheaney v. Ocean S. S. Co. (1893) 92 Ga. 732, 19 S. E. 33.

That a fellow servant may, by care and caution, operate a defective and dangerous machine so as not to produce an injury to others, does not exempt the master from his liability for an omission to perform the duty which the law imposes upon him of exercising reasonable care and prudence in furnishing safe and suitable appliances for the use of his servants. The rule which excuses the master under such circumstances presupposes that he has performed the obligations which the law imposes upon him, and that the injury occurs through the negligence of the employees. Stringham v. Stewart (1885) 100 N. Y. 516, 3 N. E. 575.

Where the injury to the servant has been occasioned by the default of a fellow servant, concurring with the negligence of the master, the latter is liable as though he only were at fault. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Nuckolls (1895) 91 Va. 193, 21 S. E. 342.

We are not prepared to say that if one uses a dangerous instrumentality without the safeguards which science and experience suggest, or the positive rules of law require, he is not to be responsible for an injury resulting from such use, because the negligence of one of his servants may have contributed to the result, or because the vigilance of the servant might have prevented the injury. Cayser v. Taylor (1857) 10 Gray, 274, 69 Am. Dec. 317.

Contributory negligence of a fellow servant does not preclude recovery for an injury to an employee of which the proximate cause was the failure of the employer to furnish a suitable appliance. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Lannigan (1895) 58 Kan. 109, 42 Pac. 343.

A master is not relieved from liability for injury to a servant by the mere fact that the injury was partly caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, if it clearly appears that the accident would not have happened had not the master himself been negligent. Northern P. R. Co. v. Poirier (1895) 15 C. C. A. 52, 29 U. S. App. 583, 67 Fed. 881.

A master, to be exempt from liability to a servant for negligence of fellow servants, must himself have been free from negligence. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McKensie (1895) 81 Va. 71.

Where the negligence of the master is an efficient cause of the servant's injury, it is not material how many others are also in fault. McMahon v. Davidson (1867) 12 Minn. 357, Gil. 232.

The rule that a servant takes the risk of the service, including the negligence of the co-servants, presupposes that the master has procured proper servants and proper machinery for the conduct of the work; and if the master is negligent in these respects, and injury results to a servant from such neglect, the master is liable, although the immediate negligence is that of the fellow servant. Craig v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1898) 54 Mo. App. 523.

The general principle of which we have here a special application is that "it is no defense in an action for a negligent injury that the negligence of a third person, or an inevitable accident, or an inanimate thing, contributed to cause the injury of the plaintiff, if the negligence of the defendant was the efficient cause of the injury." The Joseph B. Thomas (1897) 81 Fed. 578. In this case it was expressly decided that the rule is the same in the admiralty as it is at the common law. Compare, also, the statement that "one is liable for an injury caused by the concurring negligence of himself and another to the same extent as for one caused entirely by his own negligence." St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Needham (1895) 16 C. C. A. 457, 32 U. S. App. 635, 69 Fed. 823.

Wherever, therefore, the evidence suggests that the injury may have been caused by the negligence of the master, as well as by that of the delinquent coemployee, the proper course is to submit the question of the master's liability to the jury under proper instructions. Stringham v. Stewart (1885) 100 N. Y. 516, 3 N. E. 575. Reversing on this ground (1882) 64 How. Pr. 5.

In Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Cummings (1882) 106 U. S. 700, 27 L. ed. 266, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493, an instruction was upheld which in effect declared that if the negligence of the defendant company contributed to—that is to say, had a share in producing—the injury, the company was liable, even though the negligence of a fellow servant of the plaintiff was contributory also.

It is error to refuse an instruction embodying the principle that the master is liable where his own negligence contributed to the injury of the servant, if the evidence is susceptible of the construction that there was concurrent negligence. Maupin v. Texas & P. R. Co. (1900) 40 C. C. A. 284, 99 Fed. 49.

When it is alleged in the declaration that the plaintiff was injured by reason of a defective switch, and one of the defenses was that he was himself in fault in that he was violating the rules of the company by running at higher speed than he was directed to when passing a switch, it is error to charge the jury that if this increased speed was caused by the fault of other employees of the company, they should find for the plaintiff. Such a charge puts the case wholly on the question as to who was at fault for the speed with which the cars approached the switch, and, leaving out of view altogether the other question, whether the master was at fault as to the switch, tells the jury to find for the plaintiff if the increased speed was the fault of other employees than the plaintiff's husband. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Oaks (1874) 52 Ga. 410.

On the other hand, it is not error to refuse an instruction disregarding the rule stated above, where the facts are such that it may render the master liable. Union Show Case Co. v. Blindauer (1898) 75 Ill. App. 358; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Zapp (1899; Tex. Civ. App.) 49 S. W. 678; Dodd v. Bell (1897) 15 App. Div. 258, 44 N. Y. Supp. 198.

Where an accident is partly caused by the fact that an appliance was defective, and partly by the negligence of the plaintiff's fellow servants, an instruction that plaintiff cannot recover for any act of theirs is properly refused. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Stein (1894) 140 Ind. 61, 89 N. E. 246; Morrissey v. Hughes (1893) 65 Vt. 553, 27 Atl. 205.

An instruction to the effect that if the excessive speed of the train contributed to cause an accident the plaintiff could not recover is rightly refused where the essential cause of the accident was a defective wheel. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Kelly (1896; Tex. Civ. App.) 35 S. W. 878.

Where the plaintiff avers that he was injured through the negligence of railroad receivers in failing to maintain a safe track, and adduces evidence in support of his averment, it is not error to refuse an instruction to the effect that he cannot recover "if his injury was caused by the negligence of the engineer." The word "solely" should be inserted before "caused" to make such a charge proper. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Woods (1894; Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 741.

There is no error in a charge to the effect that the plaintiff, a fireman, is entitled to recover for injuries caused by the derailment of his engine, "if one of the proximate causes of the accident, without which it would not have happened," was the unsafe condition of a wheel or a brake, "notwithstanding the negligence of the engineer or brakeman may have contributed to the accident." Such a charge does not amount to a direction to find for the plaintiff under the supposed circumstances, "although the negligence of the fellow servants may have caused the injury." St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. McClain (1891) 80 Tex. 85, 15 S. W. 789.

An instruction that a brakeman injured while coupling could not recover if his injury was caused by the negligence of the engineer, and that no liability attached unless the "defendant alone was negligent," and "its negligence produced the injury," is sufficiently favorable to the defendant. Wright v. Southern P. R. Co. (1896) 14 Utah, 383, 46 Pac. 874.

Any complaint is good against demurrer if it alleges facts reasonably susceptible of the construction that the injury was caused by the combined negligence of the master and a fellow servant. Young v. Shickle, H. & H. Iron Co. (1890) 103 Mo. 324, 15 S. W. 771 (complaint held sufficient which showed that a platform was not protected by railing—that a fellow servant ran against plaintiff and knocked him off).

A complaint which alleges, in substance, that a following train struck and splintered the car in which the plaintiff, a brakeman, was traveling, and that such car was improperly constructed,—as that it had no doors or windows at the end, or cupola on the top, through which approaching danger could be seen,—is demurrable, since it fails to show in what way the construction of the car, as well as the negligence of the servants on the following train, was an efficient cause of the injury. For aught that appears from the averments, such an accident might have happened if the company had furnished the kind of car suggested by the plaintiff. Lutz v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. (1892) 6 N. M. 496, 16 L. R. A. 819, 30 Pac. 912 (two judges dissented).

In order to establish a right to recover upon this theory, the servant must show that the accident would not have occurred unless the master had been negligent. (Whittaker v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. [1888] 49 Hun, 400, 3 N. Y. Supp. 576); and the jury should be so instructed. McCabe v. Brainard (1897) 17 App. Div. 45, 44 N. Y. Supp. 964.

Any charge the effect of which is to induce in the minds of the jury the belief that if the master was guilty of any negligence whatever he is liable, even though the accident would have occurred without such negligence, is erroneous. Hall v. Cooperstown & S. V. R. Co. (1888) 49 Hun, 376, 3 N. Y. Supp. 584. In this case the court sustained an exception to a charge which was substantially to this effect: That if the jury found that there was negligence on the part of the delinquent coemployee, and also negligence on the part of the defendant, then the defendant was liable for the reason that if the injury was the result partially of the negligence of a coemployee, and partially of the omission of the defendant in not taking the necessary or proper precautions to protect the servant, then the negligence of the coemployee would not relieve the defendant.

d. Illustrative cases as to concurrent negligence.

The cases cited below in which the principles explained in the last subdivision were applied, are classified under headings indicative of the nature of the antecedent breach of duty by the master. The character of the fellow servant's delinquency is also stated. Where nothing is said expressly as to the result of the decisions, it is to be understood that the servant was held to be entitled to recover.

1. In respect to an order or other official act of a vice principal by virtue of his rank.

See, generally, note to O'Neil v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900: Minn.) 51 L. R. A. 584, as to distinction between official and nonofficial acts.

Negligence of a fellow servant, combined with a negligent order of the employer to produce an injury to an employee, will not relieve the employer from liability. Lago v. Walsh (1898) 98 Wis. 348, 74 N. W. 212; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Henderson (1882) 37 Ohio St. 549 (by special order of the superintendent, which was unreasonable, a construction train was allowed to stand on the track, and, through the negligence of a flagman sent to give warning of the approach of other trains, was run into to the injury of a trainman).

A conductor's ordering a train to run by a station where a section foreman is waiting to give information of a defective bridge, after knowledge that there are disastrous floods and washouts upon the road, is the proximate cause of the breaking of the train through such bridge, notwithstanding the engineer fails to see a danger signal near the bridge and himself stop the train at the bridge, where the engineer may have inferred, or does infer, that the conductor learned there was no more danger ahead, and no need to stop and inquire. Union P. R. Co. v. Callaghan (1898) 6 C. C. A. 205, 12 U. S. App. 541, 56 Fed. 988. The court said: "The negligence of the engineer was not an intervening cause that interrupted or turned aside the natural sequence of events, or prevented the natural and probable effect of the conductor's negligence. It simply failed to interpose the engineer's care to prevent this probable result, and left the natural sequence of events to flow on undisturbed to the fatal effect. It may be true that if the engineer had obeyed the danger signal on the track, or had seen the damage to the bridge, and had stopped the train, the accident would not have happened; but his failure was but the concurring or succeeding negligence of a servant, which permitted the conductor's breach of duty to work out undisturbed the disastrous result of which it was the primary and efficient cause."

A special finding that an injury was caused by the carelessness of a coemployee in assisting the plaintiff to carry out an order involving danger will not justify a court in entering judgment for the defendant in the face of a general verdict for the plaintiff. "It is not the law that if a master wrongfully puts his servant in danger, to co-operate with another servant, that the carelessness of the latter, co-operating with the danger, discharges the master from responsibility." Gall v. Beckstein (1896) 66 Ill. App. 478.

As a conductor has full control of his train, and is able to stop it if the engineer undertakes to run past a certain station in violation of the time-card rules, a collision which results from such negligence is deemed to be in part attributable to the conductor's breach of duty. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Spence (1893) 93 Tenn. 173, 28 S. W. 211.

A railroad company is liable for an injury to an engine hostler caused by the negligence of the yard master in sending him forward with the engine on a track upon which he has thrown some box cars in charge of a brakeman, although the negligence of such brakeman in bringing the cars too close to a switch on which such hostler is directed to take his engine contributes to the injury. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Phelps (1894) 90 Va. 665, 19 S. E. 652.

A railroad company is not liable for injuries sustained by a brakeman ordered by his superior to make a coupling, if the accident was occasioned by the negligence of the engineer or fireman in failing to heed signals; but if their negligence concurred with that of the superior, who had promised to stop the car in time to avoid harm to the brakeman, then the company is liable. Louisiana Extension R. Co. v. Carstens (1898) 19 Tex. Civ. App. 190, 47 S. W. 36.

An employee ruptured while attempting to support one end of a switch point being unloaded from a car may recover therefor, although the negligence of fellow servants in lifting too quickly contributed thereto, when the negligence of the foreman (a vice principal under the statute), who failed to give assistance as he had been doing, was a concurrent cause of the injury. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Hannig (1899) 20 Tex. Civ. App. 649, 49 S. W. 116.

See also Augusta v. Owens (1900) 111 Ga. 464, 86 S. E. 830 (superintendent negligently ordered plaintiff's fellow servant to do certain work, and the injury was caused immediately by the negligence of that fellow servant); Davidson v. Cornell (1890) 31 N. Y. S. R. 982, 10 N. Y. Supp. 521, Reversed in (1892) 132 N. Y. 228, 80 N. E. 573, but not on this point (unsafe method of constructing scaffold prescribed—work negligently carried out by servants); Norris v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1900) 88 Ill. App. 614 (negligent order of a vice principal co-operated with a nonofficial act—failure to put out a signal light to warn incoming trains that track was obstructed); Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. White (1900) 23 Tex. Civ. App. 280, 56 S. W. 204 (foreman of switching crew a vice principal under Texas statute—signaled to pull a derailed car in the direction of plaintiff—negligence was that of a switchman).

2. In regard to the nonperformance of a statutory duty.

The following extract from the opinion in Cayser v. Taylor (1857) 10 Gray, 274, 69 Am. Dec. 817, is self-explanatory: "The very object and purpose of a safeguard like the fusible plug are protection against the occasional carelessness and negligence of the engineer. It is intended to be in some degree a substitute for his vigilance—to keep watch if he nods. To say that the master should not be responsible for an injury which would not have happened had a safeguard required by law been used, because the engineer was negligent, would be to say, in substance and effect, that he should not be liable at all for an injury resulting from the failure to use it." See also Morris v. Stanfield (1898) 81 Ill. App. 264 (boy employed under the statutory age was pulled by a fellow servant into the position where he was injured).

3. In respect to a defective roadbed on railways.

Franklin v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. (1887) 37 Minn. 409, 34 N. W. 898 (negligence of railway company in not covering an open culvert where couplings had to be made concurred with negligence of conductor in requiring coupling to be made at that place); Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Pettis (1888) 69 Tex. 689, 7 S. W. 93 (railroad company not excused for its breach of duty in allowing rotten ties to remain in its track by the fact that the trackmen were negligent in failing to notify it in time to avert an accident from the defect. It seems to have been assumed, though the point was not discussed, that the company had constructive knowledge of the defects); Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Woods (1894; Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 741 (defective roadbed—disregard of signals by engineer); Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Kelly (1896; Tex. Civ. App.) 35 S. W. 878 (derailment due to defective wheel and track combined with fast running of train); Trinity & S. R. Co. v. Brown (1898) 46 S. W. 926 (sand allowed to accumulate on the track—train run at a reckless rate of speed); Clyde v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1894) 59 Fed. 394 (defective rail—undue speed of train); Smith v. Memphis & L. R. Co. (1883) 18 Fed. 304 (similar facts); Stetler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1879) 46 Wis. 497, 1 N. W. 112 (1880) 49 Wis. 609, 6 N. W. 303 (similar facts); Morrisey v. Hughes (1893) 65 Vt. 563, 27 Atl. 205 (blocking of rails at the top of an incline was defective—truck running on those rails was run negligently).

A railroad company is liable for injuries to a brakeman while performing his duty of keeping a passenger off the step, by being struck by a train upon another track at a curve where the tracks were too close together for the safe passage of trains, although the engineer of one of the trains was negligent in undertaking to pass at that point. Mulvaney v. Brooklyn City R. Co. (1892) 1 Misc. 425, 21 N. Y. Supp. 427.

In Torlian v. Richmond & A. R. Co. (1887) 84 Va. 192, 4 S. E. 339, a section master was regarded as vice principal in respect to the repair of the track and as a mere servant in respect to signaling trains to slacken speed where the repairs were going on. This is the theory of the cases as explained in Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Nuckolls (1895) 91 Va. 195, 21 S. E. 342.

4. In respect to defective switches.

St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Needham (1895) 16 C. C. A. 457, 32 U. S. App. 635, 69 Fed. 823 (injury caused by neglect of a railroad company to maintain a target upon a switch negligently left open by fellow servants); Bennett v. Long Island R. Co. (1897) 21 App. Div. 25, 47 N. Y. Supp. 258 (train operated at excessive speed was run into an open switch not provided with a target); Stucke v. Orleans R. Co. (1898) 50 La. Ann. 188, 23 So. 342 (fellow servant allowed car to run onto siding through a defective switch and hurt a car repairer who had not received any warning as to the risks arising from the condition of the switch); Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Oaks (1874) 52 Ga. 410 (defective switch—negligent management of train); Chicago & A. R. Co. v. House (1898) 172 Ill. 601, 50 N. E. 151, Affirming (1896) 71 Ill. App. 147 (switch not provided with signal light was left open by coservant, and run into by train moving at an unlawful rate of speed); Ellingson v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1895) 80 Mo. App. 679 (switch light was not provided—negligence of brakeman in misplacing switch and signaling for train to come on caused collision); Monmouth Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Erling (1892) 45 Ill. App. 411 (brakeman injured by the want of a lamp on a switchstand—engineer knew of defect, but failed to impart his knowledge to the plaintiff).

5. In respect to dangerous objects close to railway tracks.

Howe v. St. Clair (1894) 8 Tex. Civ. App. 101, 27 S. W. 800 (dangerous objects not removed—train negligently operated); North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Dudgeon (1899) 83 Ill. App. 528, Affirmed in (1900) 184 Ill. 477, 56 N. E. 796 (pile of stones left near track—gripman started car before plaintiff had got a proper footing thereon).

The fact that a track walker has failed to do his duty in giving notice of a possible danger to trains from the falling of a rock near the track will not excuse the company if it does actually fall. The company being bound to remove such a danger, a breach of its duty in this respect is not to be condoned because the servant deputed to look out for the danger has also failed in his duty. Bean v. Western N. C. R. Co. (1890) 107 N. C. 731, 12 S. E. 600. Compare last case cited in preceding subdivision, and Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Pettis (1888) 69 Tex. 689, 7 S. W. 93, VIII. d, 2, supra.

6. In respect to defective bridges.

Elmer v. Locke (1883) 135 Mass. 575 (defective trestle gave way under train allowed to escape from control); Carney v. Caragnet R. Co. (1890) 29 N. B. 425 (roadmaster ordering train to be taken over a defective bridge).

7. In respect to the improper making up of trains.

Moon v. Richmond & A. R. Co. (1884) 78 Va. 745, 49 Am. Rep. 401 (train run at undue speed). This is the theory of the cases as explained in Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Nuckolls (1895) 91 Va. 195, 21 S. E. 342. But the making up of trains is, by most of the authorities, deemed to be a mere detail of the work. See V. o, 1, supra.

8. In respect to the want of proper lighting of the place of work.

Irmer v. St. Louis Brewing Co. (1897) 69 Mo. App. 17 (no proper arrangements for lighting a passageway—the result being that the plaintiff fell through a trap door left open by a fellow servant, which he might have discovered but for the obscurity); Swift & Co. v. O'Neill (1899) 88 Ill. App. 162, Affirmed (1900) 187 Ill. 837, 58 N. E. 416 (plaintiff run down by a truck in an imperfectly lighted alley).

9. In respect to uncovered machinery.

Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Harkins (1893) 5 C. C. A. 326, 17 U. S. App. 22, 55 Fed. 932 (fellow servant ordered plaintiff to work near an unguarded shaft).

10. In respect to defective scaffolds.

Drommie v. Hogan (1891) 153 Mass. 29, 26 N. E. 237 (dropping of stone subjected a defective staging to an increased strain); Cole v. Warren Mfg. Co. (1899) 63 N. J. L. 626, 44 Atl. 647 (coservant lowered himself down onto a defective scaffold, which gave way); Bannon v. Sanden (1896) 68 Ill. App. 164 (failure of master to discover defect in scaffold concurred with negligence of fellow servant in throwing down a load of stones on it in such a violent manner as to make it fall).

11. In respect to other abnormal dangers of the place of work.

Deweese v. Meramec Iron Min. Co. (1895) 128 Mo. 423, 31 S. W. 110 (plaintiff set to work in a place where stones were constantly falling—fellow servant failed to keep watch for them); Hancock v. Keene (1892) 5 Ind. App. 408, 32 N. E. 329 (coemployee's negligence in blasting caused injury to plaintiff required to work in an unsafe tunnel); Crowell v. Thomas (1895) 90 Hun, 193, 35 N. Y. Supp. 936 (explosion occurred where steam was incautiously let into a barrel used for heating water, the vent of which by the negligence of the defendant's manager had been left plugged); Tetherton v. United States Talc Co. (1899) 41 App. Div. 613, 58 N. Y. Supp. 55 (dangerous pillar brought down in a mine by an excessive blast put in by a coservant); Lauter v. Duckworth (1898) 19 Ind. App. 335, 48 N. E. 864 (steam negligently admitted into defective waste pipe); Bagley v. Consolidated Gas Co. (1895) 13 Misc. 6, 84 N. Y. Supp. 187 (negligence of foreman allowed a tank to move unsteadily while it was being hoisted, the consequence being that it dislodged some planks from a scaffold and they fell on plaintiff—superincumbency of the plank held to be a concurring cause of the accident); Psepka v. American Glucose Co. (1895) 11 Misc. 131, 31 N. Y. Supp. 1019 (defective insulation of electric wires caused a fire—fellow servants were negligent in failing to put it out).

The continued flow of burning oil, which would have been at once checked except for the master's negligent failure to provide the usual facilities for cutting off the supply, is the proximate cause which will render him liable in case of injury resulting therefrom to a servant, although this would not have happened if a fellow servant had not also been negligent in failing to cut off the supply by the use of the less adequate facilities that did exist. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Laack (1892) 143 Ill. 242, 18 L. R. A. 215, 32 N. E. 285.

A master must respond in damages for an injury caused by a heavy object which was allowed to fall on the plaintiff by a coservant, where the plaintiff was set at work in a place where there was danger of the fall of such objects. The Magdaline (1898) 91 Fed. 798.

12. In respect to defective railway cars.

New Jersey & N. Y. R. Co. v. Yeung (1892) 1 C. C. A. 428, 1 U. S. App. 96, 49 Fed. 723, Affirming (1891) 46 Fed. 160 (car run at improper speed could not be stopped in time to avoid a collision owing to its brakes being defective); Lilly v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1887) 107 N. Y. 566, 14 N. E. 508 (coservants negligently ran cars against a stationary one and so caused an injury which would not have been received if the stationary car had not moved a considerable distance on account of its brake being defective); St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. McClain (1891) 80 Tex. 85, 15 S. W. 789 (train with a defective wheel was run down a grade too fast); Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Kelly (1896); Tex. Civ. App. 85 S. W. 878 (car with defective wheel run too fast); Ransler v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1884) 32 Minn. 331, 20 N. W. 332 (use of defective brake by brakeman after discovering its condition caused a collision between sections of train which had separated on a descending grade); Hollingsworth v. Long Island R. Co. (1895) 91 Hun, 641, 36 N. Y. Supp. 1126 (car with defective brake negligently managed); Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Rains (1897); Tex. Civ. App. 40 S. W. 635 (servants negligently set cars with defective brakes in motion on an excessively steep grade); International & G. N. R. Co. v. Sipole (1898); Tex. Civ. App. 29 S. W. 686 (injury caused partly by want of handhold and partly by leaving cars so close to the end or siding as to be dangerous to men on trains on the main track); Southern P. R. Co. v. Leash (1893) 2 Tex. Civ. App. 68, 21 S. W. 563 (plaintiff working as fireman of pile-driver engine was thrown off by a jolt received from a moving car, because there was nothing to hold onto when the shock came).

Failure to furnish suitable appliances for coupling cars, although the negligence of a fellow servant also contributes to produce the injury. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Ampey (1896) 93 Va. 108, 25 S. E. 226 (injury to brakeman caused both by defective couplings and by excessive speed with which cars were brought together); Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Kiziah (1898) 86 Tex. 81, 28 S. W. 578, Reversing 4 Tex. Civ. App. 362, 22 S. W. 110, 26 S. W. 242 (defect in air brakes which allowed cars to start on a grade and roll against the car which plaintiff was repairing, combined with negligence of another car repairer or a brakeman in failing to secure the cars by hand brakes); Donohue v. Brooklyn City R. Co. (1891) 38 N. Y. 54 L. R. A.

X. S. R. 485, 14 N. Y. Supp. 639 (injury caused to coupler partly by defective buffers, and partly by backing of engine with undue speed).

An employee may recover for injuries sustained, notwithstanding the contributory negligence of a coemployee, if the negligence of the employer contributed to the injury. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Bonats (1898); Tex. Civ. App. 48 S. W. 767 (defective couplings—engine negligently backed); International & G. N. R. Co. v. Zapp (1899); Tex. Civ. App. 49 S. W. 673 (defective bumper beam—cars negligently managed); Ellis v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1884) 95 N. Y. 546 (brakeman, trying to escape from an impending rear collision with a following train, might have succeeded if the buffers between his own and the next preceding car had not been so defective as to allow the cars to come together and crush him when the collision occurred; case held to be for jury); McMahon v. Henning (1880) 1 McCrary, 516, 3 Fed. 353 (cars with defective bumpers were run together with dangerous speed); Delude v. St. Paul City R. Co. (1893) 55 Minn. 63, 56 N. W. 461 (similar facts); Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Gillison (1898) 173 Ill. 264, 50 N. E. 657, Affirming (1887) 72 Ill. App. 207 (accident caused partly by mismanagement of engineer in stopping the forward section of a train after it had separated owing to defects in a draw-bar); Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Sweeney (1896) 14 Tex. Civ. App. 216, 36 S. W. 800 (similar facts); Richmond & D. R. Co. v. George (1891) 88 Va. 223, 13 S. E. 429 (coupling was defective—engineer backed without a signal); Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Mansberger (1895) 12 C. C. A. 574, 24 U. S. App. 551, 65 Fed. 196 (accident due partly to a defective coupling pin, and partly to the negligence of an engineer in backing cars down grade too rapidly); Towns v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. (1885) 37 La. Ann. 630 (use of cars of such unequal height as to render their buffers useless concurred with negligence of engineer in backing cars for coupling, at an improper speed); Browning v. Wabash Western R. Co. (1894) 124 Mo. 55, 24 S. W. 731, Affirmed in 27 S. W. 644 (vice principal allowed brake staffs to be removed, and left cars heavily loaded near the top of a heavy grade—negligence of fellow servant consisted in not seeing that the cars were all coupled before backing the engine against them, and in throwing the switch so that they ran onto the main line).

In Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Berkey (1894) 136 Ind. 181, 35 N. E. 3, it was laid down that the negligence of a coemployee in failing to inspect the couplings on a train will not relieve a railroad company from liability for the death of a brakeman due to defective couplings, whose unfitness was known to the company, or could have been known with reasonable diligence. The opinion relies, without any clear differentiation, both upon the doctrine as to concurrent negligence, and upon the rule that the employee performing the duty of inspection is a vice principal.

13. In respect to defective locomotives.

Where a locomotive, the valves of which have been leaking for several months, to the knowledge both of the company's superintendent and of the engineer, is left unattended by the latter without his taking certain precautions which would, as he knew, have prevented the escape of steam into the cylinder, the company is liable for injuries received by a car repairer as a result of the locomotive being set in motion by such an escape of steam. Cone v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1880) 81 N. Y. 206, 37 Am. Rep. 491, Affirming (1878) 15 Hun, 172.

Where the plaintiff, while cleaning the ash pan of an engine, was injured through its sudden starting by reason of a leaking throttle, the mere fact that the accident would not have happened if a coservant had performed his duty of blocking the wheels will not prevent a recovery. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Holt (1883) 29 Kan. 149. See also San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Harding (1896) 11 Tex. Civ. App. 497, 38 S. W. 373 (railroad company held to be liable for the death of an engineer caused in part by its negligence in failing to keep the headlight of the switch engine in good condition, so that its position on the track might be seen from an approaching train, although the yard hands may have been negligent in letting it stand upon the track); Fowler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1884) 61 Wis. 159, 21 N. W. 40 (accident caused partly by mismatched couplings and partly by negligence of engineer); Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. (1879) 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. ed. d12 (negligence of railway company in furnishing defective engine concurred with negligence of coservants in sending it out on the road); Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Stein (1894) 140 Ind. 61, 39 N. E. 246 (collision caused partly by defective condition of an engine and partly by mismanagement of the train); Crutchfield v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1877) 76 N. C. 320 (negligence of master in having a defective engine concurred with that of the engineer in using it); Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kenley (1893) 92 Tenn. 207, 21 S. W. 326 (cars of train suddenly jammed together by engineer without warning when brakeman was in the act of putting his foot upon a defective foot-rest).

The liability of a railway company should be submitted to the jury where an employee, while engaged in the performance of his duties, is injured by a rear collision, partly owing to the neglect of a fellow servant to place a tall light on the cars, and partly to the defective condition of the locomotive, which disturbed the time arrangements and rendered the shock of the collision when it came more severe. Chandler v. Melbourne & H. B. R. Co. (1871) 2 Vict. L. Rep. 71.

14. In respect to defective hand cars.

Northern P. R. Co. v. Charless (1896) 162 U. S. 359, 40 L. ed. 999, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 848, Affirming (1892) 2 C. C. A. 350, 7 U. S. App. 359, 51 Fed. 562 (hand car with defective brake run at excessive speed—liability conceded, arguendo, supposing this combination of facts to be established); Maupin v. Texas & P. R. Co. (1900) 40 C. C. A. 234, 99 Fed. 49 (same facts); International & G. N. R. Co. v. Williams (1896; Tex. Civ. App.) 34 S. W. 161, (same facts); Cowan v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1891) 80 Wis. 284, 50 N. W. 180 (section foreman was negligent in running hand car with a defective brake past a switch after hearing warning signals).

15. In regard to defective machinery of other kinds.

Dixon v. Pittsburg & G. Lumber Co. (1900) 52 La. Ann. 1109, 27 So. 654; Mexican C. R. Co. v. Murray (1900) 42 C. C. A. 334, 102 Fed. 264 (breaking of defective hoisting machinery was followed by contributory negligence of coservant); Anderson v. The Ashebrooke (1890) 44 Fed. 124 (fellow servants continued to operate defective tackling with knowledge of its condition); Monmouth Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Erling (1894) 148 Ill. 521, 36 N. E. 117 (negligence in operating defective machinery for the proper repair of which the master had not supplied proper materials); Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Lannigan (1896) 56 Kan. 109, 42 Pac. 343 54 L. R. A.

(brakeman injured while coupling, partly owing to his lantern furnishing insufficient light, and partly through the negligence of the engineer in bringing the cars together with excessive speed); Myers v. Hudson Iron Co. (1889) 150 Mass. 125, 22 N. E. 631 (engineer negligent in operating hoisting apparatus of which brake was defective); Craig v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1893) 54 Mo. App. 523 (assurance of safety by fellow servant, machinery being inadequate for work to be done); Stringham v. Stewart (1885) 100 N. Y. 516, 3 N. E. 575 (defective elevator); McCabe v. Brainard (1897) 17 App. Div. 45, 44 N. Y. Supp. 964 (defect in step of wagon negligently driven); Auld v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. (1898) 34 App. Div. 491, 54 N. Y. Supp. 222 (dangerous kind of door in elevator cage was negligently closed by operator and caught plaintiff); Larkin v. Washington Mills Co. (1899) 45 App. Div. 6, 61 N. Y. Supp. 93 (injury partly caused by the negligence of some third person in moving an elevator, and partly by defects in the elevator gate); Strauss v. Haberman Mfg. Co. (1898) 25 App. Div. 623, 48 N. Y. Supp. 1116 (defective part of press, being left untied by the foreman, fell on the plaintiff); Kern v. De Castro & D. Sugar Ref. Co. (1889) 24 N. Y. S. R. 748, 5 N. Y. Supp. 548 (failure to equip elevator with proper safety appliances, combined with negligence of engineer in pushing it off when it had caught); Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Ferch (1898) 18 Tex. Civ. App. 46, 44 S. W. 817 (pile driver not properly inspected was operated with a leaky valve); Williams v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1892) 2 Misc. 30, 21 N. Y. Supp. 259 (coservant selected a defective tool from among a stock which comprised a good many which were known by the master to be defective); Kaiser v. Flaccus (1890) 138 Pa. 332, 22 Atl. 88 (shaft ran so loosely that the belt fell off and struck plaintiff—engineer was also negligent); Dodd v. Bell (1897) 15 App. Div. 258, 44 N. Y. Supp. 198 (defendant liable for injury caused by defective pulley on which belt ran, though coemployee may have been negligent in ordering plaintiff to work where such defect exposed him to danger); Sherman v. Menominee River Lumber Co. (1888) 72 Wis. 122, 1 L. R. A. 173, 30 N. W. 365 (edger-saw out of repair—feeder of machine careless in attempting to remove the plank which caused the injury).

16. In respect to the employment of suitable servants.

The negligence of a railway company in putting the delinquent servant in the position of extra man, who might be selected by the conductor to fill a vacancy, and not the negligence, if any, of the conductor in assigning him work, is the primary cause of an accident which results from his unfitness. Mann v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1883) 91 N. Y. 495 (negligence of the conductor said to be secondary and co-operative merely). See also Coppins v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1888) 48 Hun. 298 (derailment due partly to switch being left open by switchman known to be careless in the performance of his work, and partly to negligence of engineer).

There is also considerable authority for bringing within the scope of the rule under discussion the cases in which the negligence shown is that of the incumbent servant himself. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Arispe (1891) 81 Tex. 517, 17 S. W. 47; Handley v. Daly Min. Co. (1897) 15 Utah, 176, 49 Pac. 295; Craig v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1893) 54 Mo. App. 523; O'Laughlin v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1887) 27 N. Y. Week. Dig. 109, 9 N. Y. S. R. 384 (incompetent engineer selected to run a disabled engine "wild-cat"); Crew v. St. Louis, K.

& N. W. R. Co. (1884) 20 Fed. 87 (negligence of master as regards hiring of servants and framing of rules concurred with the negligence of servants in operating train); Terrell v. Russell (1897) 16 Tex. Civ. App. 573, 42 S. W. 129 (negligent management of engine by incompetent engineer); Killien v. Hyde (1894) 63 Fed. 172 (injury caused by the negligence of the master in putting a deck hand at the wheel of a tug, the consequence being that his negligence caused a collision).

Logically speaking, this is not an impossible view; but it seems preferable to regard such an infringement of duty as being rather the sole efficient cause of the injury in the same sense as similar negligence in respect to the provision and maintenance of the inanimate agencies of work. This is the theory in a case where it was held that a brakeman may recover for injuries caused by the giving way of a defective brake wheel, the result being that he was thrown off the car, where the fall was due to the oscillation produced by the sudden application of the brake while the train was being run at an excessive rate of speed, by an engineer whom the company could have known to be reckless and of intemperate habits if it had instituted proper inquiries. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Jewell (1887) 46 Ill. 99, 92 Am. Dec. 240.

17. In respect to the failure to employ an adequate number of servants.

The negligence of an engineer in starting a train at the station where it is made up without seeing, as he is required by the rules to do, that the brakeman assigned to it, or a sufficient number, are aboard, will not absolve the company from the liability predicated upon its duty to see that the train does not start with an insufficient crew. Booth v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1878) 73 N. Y. 38, 29 Am. Rep. 97.

The fact that the employee who threw a bale into the hold of a ship was negligent in doing so when no hatch tender was there, without himself warning those in the hold, will not defeat the plaintiff's right to recover, if the defendant was negligent in failing to supply a hatch tender. Cheney v. Ocean S. S. Co. (1893) 92 Ga. 732, 19 S. E. 33. See also Swift & Co. v. Rutkowski (1898) 82 Ill. App. 108 (negligence of coservant in handling machinery concurred with negligence in failing to employ a sufficient number of servants); Craig v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1893) 54 Mo. App. 523 (assurance of safety by fellow servant, where there were an insufficient number of men); Sincere v. Union Compress & Warehouse Co. (1897; Tex. Civ. App.) 40 S. W. 326 (insufficient number of men furnished to handle bales of cotton, one of which was allowed to fall on plaintiff while it was being hoisted); Wright v. Southern P. Co. (1896) 14 Utah, 383, 46 Pac. 374 (engineer operating a defective engine, upon which, though it required an unusual amount of attention to control its movements, the company had placed no fireman who could observe the signals of a brakeman engaged in coupling).

18. In respect to a defective system.

A railway employee's right of action for injuries caused by the running of a train at an illegal rate of speed is not defeated because he and those in charge of the train were fellow servants, where the train was run pursuant to a time card promulgated by the company employing him. Bluehorn v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1891) 108 Mo. 439, 18 S. W. 1103. See also Warn v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1894) 80 Hun, 71, 29 N. Y. Supp. 397; Paulmier v. Erie R. Co. (1870) 34 N. J. L. 151 (injury caused partly by arrangements requiring trains to be run frequently to a point where a trestle too weak to support a locomotive began, and partly by the negligence of the engineer in disobeying orders not to take his engine beyond that point); Luebke v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1883) 59 Wis. 127, 48 Am. Rep. 483, 17 N. W. 870 (want of proper system for protection of car repairer, concurring with negligence of foreman in setting plaintiff to work without seeing that he was protected); Faren v. Sellers (1887) 39 La. Ann. 1011, 3 So. 363 (negligence of coservant in carrying out a faulty method of taking down a building); Pool v. Southern P. Co. (1899) 20 Utah, 210, 58 Pac. 326 (no proper system for protecting car repairers—engineer negligently backed a car against one under repair).

19. In respect to seeing that regulations are duly carried out.

The master is liable where the injury complained of was caused partly by a coservant's disregard of rules, and partly by the negligence of the master himself, or of some employee for whose omissions of duty he is responsible. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Heck (1898) 151 Ind. 292, 50 N. E. 988 (collision due partly to the train despatcher's neglect of rules and partly to a coservant's disobedience of other rules). See also Northern P. R. Co. v. Poirier (1895) 15 C. C. A. 52, 29 U. S. App. 583, 67 Fed. 881 (collision caused by negligence of train despatcher and conductor of following train); Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Clark (1893) 6 C. C. A. 281, 16 U. S. App. 17, 57 Fed. 125 (negligence of train despatcher in moving trains—negligence of engineer and conductor in running train too fast); Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Lang (1889) 118 Ind. 679, 21 N. E. 317 (section hand killed by the negligence of those in charge of a "wild" train, of the danger of meeting which he had not been notified in any way when he received the special order, under which he was traveling on a hand car along the track when he met the train); Hunn v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1889) 78 Mich. 513, 7 L. R. A. 500, 44 N. W. 502 (negligence of train despatcher in failing to hold a train concurred with that of trainmen in running the train at undue speed); Texas & P. R. Co. v. Eberheart (1897; Tex. Civ. App.) 40 S. W. 1060, Affirmed in (1897) 91 Tex. 321, 43 S. W. 510 (negligence in regard to the enforcement of rules with regard to the protection of car repairers concurred with negligence of fellow servants in sending a moving car on the repair track).

20. In respect to the failure to notify as to abnormal dangers.

A superintendent who orders a trestle work above a dock to be torn down while men are at work under it, without notifying such men or their foremen that it is to be done, is guilty of negligence which will render the employer liable for injuries to one of such workmen from the tearing down of such trestle, notwithstanding the concurrent negligence of the foreman. Northwestern Fuel Co. v. Danielson (1893) 6 C. C. A. 636, 12 U. S. App. 688, 57 Fed. 915.

An engineer injured by the derailing of his train caused by a partly open switch may recover, notwithstanding the switch was unlocked either by a trespasser or a negligent fellow servant, where the negligence of the company in opening the switch for use after it had been abandoned for a long time, without any lights to warn the engineer of its presence or danger, was a concurrent cause of the accident. Town v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1890) 84 Mich. 214, 47 N. W. 685. "It is contended," said the court, "that the plaintiff cannot recover because the absence of the lights was not the proximate cause of the accident; that if the switch had been locked the train would have passed safely by as it was, without any lights; and that the opening or unlocking of the switch was caused either by the intermeddling of some stranger or trespasser, or by the negligence of fellow servants of the plaintiff; that he could not recover in either event. But I do not so understand it. If the plaintiff's theory be true, the lights would have prevented any accident in the condition in which the switch was, as they would have warned the plaintiff in time to avoid the danger; so the negligence of the defendant in opening this closed switch for use, without any lights to warn plaintiff of the presence of the switch or its danger, was just as much the proximate cause of the injury as was the turning of the switch rails. And it certainly was a concurrent cause, and the injury in any event, under the plaintiff's theory and evidence, was occasioned partly through the negligence of the defendant as to the switch lights, and partly by the condition of the switch rails, in which case the defendant would be liable." See also Jones v. Florence Min. Co. (1886) 66 Wis. 268, 28 N. W. 207 (failure to instruct miner as to dangers of underground work in a mine. Carelessness of fellow servants in blasting injured such miner).

Other decisions recognising the doctrine are the following: Young v. New Jersey & N. Y. R. Co. (1891) 46 Fed. 160; Flak v. Central P. R. Co. (1887) 72 Cal. 38, 13 Pac. 144; Boyce v. Fitzpatrick (1881) 80 Ind. 526; Griffin v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1889) 148 Mass. 143, 1 L. R. A. 698, 19 N. E. 166; Hogue v. Silgo Furnace Co. (1895) 62 Mo. App. 491; Flanigan v. Guggenheim Smelting Co. (1899) 63 N. J. L. 647, 44 Atl. 762; Ellis v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1884) 95 N. Y. 546; Harvey v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1890) 32 N. Y. S. R. 817, 10 N. Y. Supp. 645; Shields v. Robins (1896) 3 App. Div. 582, 88 N. Y. Supp. 214; Hollingsworth v. Long Island R. Co. (1895) 91 Hun, 641, 36 N. Y. Supp. 1126; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnson (1892) 83 Tex. 629, 19 S. W. 151; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Warner (1896; Tex. Civ. App.) 86 S. W. 118.

a. Master's liability determined with reference to the question whether the servant's delinquency did or did not break the chain of causation.

In many instances where facts resembling those presented in the citations under the preceding subdivision are involved, the liability of the master has been considered, not with reference to the question whether the negligence of the master or his representative was a concurrent or co-operative cause of the injury, but with reference to the question whether the fellow servant's negligence was or was not an intervening agency in such a sense as to break the chain of causation between the negligence of the master himself and the injury. The decisions which appear to have been rendered from this standpoint are collected below.

1. No break in the chain of causation.

If there is no break in the chain of causation the master is held to be responsible. Here it is plainly immaterial whether we refer the conclusion to the theory of concurrent causes, or to the theory of a primary cause regarded as being legally connected with the injury in spite of a subsequent act of negligence on the part of a co-servant.

In Ellis v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1884) 95 N. Y. 546, where the want of a buffer caused an injury to a brakeman while he was trying to escape from a caboose when a collision was impending, the court, in holding the dismissal of the complaint to be erroneous, reasoned thus: "It was the duty of the defendant [a railway company] to provide a car properly fitted, not only with running apparatus, as wheels, stopping apparatus, as a brake, but with buffers of some kind to protect the car and its servants necessarily or lawfully thereon from the effect of a collision. Ordinary and usual care in the equipment and running of a road requires this last appliance, or some equivalent contrivance, as much as it does either of the others. There was in effect no buffer, nor anything to take its place, on the car upon which the intestate was employed. Upon the evidence it may be said that its absence was the proximate cause of the injury. It was literally the causa causans. The immediate effect of its absence was to put the car in such condition that in case of collision at the rear its body must inevitably be impelled against the preceding car with a force to which it could offer no resistance. The death of the decedent was therefore caused by the omission of the defendant to place buffers where they belonged. For any useful or usual purpose the ones in question might as well have been placed on the top or at the side of the car as where they were."

The causal connection between the negligence of a road master in removing the brake rods of several cars and leaving them heavily loaded with rails upon an inclined side track where they are liable to be struck by other cars and set in motion is not interrupted by the act of a conductor who, desiring to avert a derailment of the cars, opens a switch and allows them to get on the main line, where they come into collision with a train. Browning v. Wabash Western R. Co. (1894) 124 Mo. 55, 24 S. W. 731, Affirmed in 27 S. W. 644.

In an action by a railroad brakeman against the company for injuries from coming in contact with the chain of a derrick allowed to swing across the track, proof that, upon the completion of the derrick, the mechanic who constructed it, and whose authority or relation to the company is not further shown, explained to the station agent, and others who expected to use it, the manner of its working and of fastening it when not in use, is not conclusive that the derrick was thereby placed by the company in the care of the station agent, so as to relieve the company from liability on the ground that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. Gates v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1892) 2 S. D. 422, 50 N. W. 907. See also Finley v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1893) 59 Fed. 419 (defects in engine brake and reversing lever caused injury to brakeman while coupling; the engineer might have controlled the movements of his engine by means of the tender brake, but was held to be justified in acting on the assumption that by using caution he might make the defective appliances work properly).

A master is liable for an injury sustained by an employee because of the incompetence of a foreman, who negligently directed machinery to be set in motion, although the accident was due to the direct act of a workman who started the machinery in obedience to the foreman's command. O'Donnell v. American Sugar Ref. Co. (1899) 41 App. Div. 307, 58 N. Y. Supp. 640.

The act of an engineer (in a state where the railway company is responsible for his negligence), who left an engine in a dangerous position in charge of an inexperienced fireman, may justifiably be found by a jury to be the proximate cause, both of an act of the fireman in putting the engine in motion and of an injury to a conductor who was thrown off while endeavoring to stop the train. Mexican Nat. R. Co. v.

Musette (1893) 7 Tex. Civ. App. 169, 24 S. W. 520, Affirmed in (1894) 86 Tex. 708, 24 L. R. A. 642, 26 S. W. 1075.

Placing heavy iron beams near an open hole in the floor, and leaving them there for two or three days in such a position that, on being pushed by a person desiring to pass, one of them toppled over and fell into the hole, is such evidence of negligence on the part of the master as will sustain a verdict in favor of a servant who was injured by the falling beam. McCauley v. Norcross (1892) 155 Mass. 584, 80 N. E. 464. The court said: "If the beams were so left that one of them would be liable, as a natural consequence, from some intervening cause or agency, to be so moved that it might fall through the floor, the fact that an intervening act or agency occurred which directly produced the injurious result would not necessarily exonerate the defendants from responsibility. Superintendence is necessary in order to guard against injuries from such intervening and inadvertent acts of careless persons as are likely to happen and ought to be guarded against. The question is whether the moving of a beam was so likely to occur that it ought to have been provided against by the superintendent. It might be found that the beams were negligently left near the hole in the floor, where they were likely or liable to be toppled over so that one of them might fall through the hole, and thus injure someone below, and that this was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, although some careless person came along and toppled them over."

Where a switchman, while running to a switch, was run over by cars making a "flying switch" on a dark night, and the evidence is that only one of them was provided with a brake in good working order, that there was no light on the front car, and that the company had promulgated no rules regarding "flying switches," the inference is that the company's omissions of duty in these respects, and not the negligence of the trainmen, were the proximate cause of the accident. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Taylor (1878) 69 Ill. 469 (holding that the doctrine of common employment was not applicable to the facts).

Where an inexperienced workman, who attempts, in obedience to orders, to start an engine which has caught upon the centre by prying it off with an iron bar, is injured by the engine starting quickly under great pressure of steam, catching him on the bar and throwing him into the gearing, the proximate cause of the injury is his obedience to the order and direction of such person, and not the action of another workman who had previously opened the throttle valve so as to give the full force of steam. Gartside Coal Co. v. Turk (1898) 147 Ill. 120, 35 N. E. 467, Affirming 47 Ill. App. 332.

The premature loading of the second platform of a freight elevator under the direction of the master's representative, and not the giving of a signal by some coservant to start the elevator while the loading was in progress, is the proximate cause of an injury caused by the dropping of a part of the load upon a workman who had been set to repair the guides of the elevator. Wells v. Bourdages (1899) 88 Ill. App. 473.

The act of the superintendent of a mill in starting machinery while an employee is engaged in oiling it is the proximate cause of the injury to such employee, rather than the starting by another employee of an independent portion of the machinery, which would not interfere with the oiling. Hughlett v. Ozark Lumber Co. (1898) 53 Mo. App. 87.

The proximate cause of an injury sustained by the fall of a beam is the negligence of the foreman, who removed the props, and sent the injured employee into a position of danger, instead of the carelessness of a fellow servant, who accidentally stepped on the beam and caused it to fall. Kansas City Car & Foundry Co. v. Secrist (1898) 59 Kan. 778, Appx., 54 Pac. 688.

The fact that a fireman jumps from an engine in order to avoid the effects of a collision which he sees to be impending with an obstruction on the track does not break the chain of causation between the injury and the negligence to which the obstruction was due. McGraw v. Texas & P. R. Co. (1898) 50 La. Ann. 466, 23 So. 461.

A master is not relieved from responsibility by the mere fact that a coservant knew of the abnormal condition, and did not report it. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Swisher (1895) 61 Ill. App. 611; Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Musette (1894) 7 Tex. Civ. App. 169, 24 S. W. 520.

Where, merely as a matter of evidence, it appears that the subsequent act of negligence of the coservant on which the master relies was not committed, there is, of course, no reason why the servant should not be allowed to recover. Perry v. Ricketts (1870) 55 Ill. 234; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Heck (1898) 151 Ind. 292, 50 N. E. 988.

2. Chain of causation deemed to have been broken.

The general principle applied in another class of cases is that the fact that an appliance furnished by an employer was defective will not entitle an injured employee to recover, where the injury was not the result of the defect, but of the negligence of a cosmployee in the use or handling of the appliance. Harvey v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1890) 57 Hun, 589, 10 N. Y. Supp. 645.

Or, as the same principle may also be formulated, a servant cannot recover on the theory that the appliances were defective, if the direct promoting cause of the injury was the negligence of a fellow servant. Trewatha v. Buchanan Gold Min. & Mill. Co. (1892) 96 Cal. 495, 28 Pac. 751, 31 Pac. 561 (disapproving change).

By an independent wrongful act which operates so as to break the chain of causation, is meant one which was not induced by the act of the master, or one which did not so operate on the conditions created by the master as to cause them to produce the injury. New York C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Perriguy (1894) 138 Ind. 414, 34 N. E. 233, 87 N. E. 976.

A negligent act of a master, which does not cause an injury to a servant, or concur with the wrongful act of a fellow servant as a cause of the injury, cannot be coupled with such wrongful act, so as to be made the basis of a recovery. Ibid.

From a logical standpoint this principle is readily susceptible of differentiation from the one considered in the last two subdivisions. But it will be observed that in a good many of the cases noted in the ensuing paragraphs, where it was denied that the master was responsible, the circumstances were such as to render it extremely difficult to reconcile them with those referred to in the last subdivision. The courts, in fact, sometimes seem to have proceeded on the hypothesis that an action can never be maintained where a coservant's dereliction of duty operates upon, and renders actively mischievous, the physical conditions previously created by the master's antecedent breach of his obligations.

a. Legal cause of the injury held not to be an official act of negligence on the part of a vice principal.

The manner in which the fellow servants of a laborer engaged in construction work lifted the rail which injured him, and not the order of the superintendent, is the proximate cause of the injury, although, after the men had lifted the rail, and had carried it forward to a car, and while there holding it, awaiting the word of command to lift it further and throw it on the car, the superintendent failed to give the word of command in such a way as to produce concert of action in the men, but, on the contrary, ordered them to get the rail on the car in any way they could, and hurried the men and used oaths, whereby they became confused and failed to act in concert. Coyne v. Union P. R. Co. (1890) 133 U. S. 370, 33 L. ed. 651, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 382.

In Northern P. R. Co. v. Polier (1897) 167 U. S. 48, 42 L. ed. 72, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 741, Reversing (1895) 15 C. C. A. 52, 29 U. S. App. 583, 67 Fed. 881, it was held that the negligence of a conductor of a "wild train" in violating rules regulating the running of trains, and not the negligence of the train despatcher, was the proximate cause of the collision. The court considered that it would be mere conjecture to deduce from the fact that the train was wild the inference that the conductor was acting under the control of the train despatcher.

Where a train despatcher has issued instructions as to the operation of a train, which, if they had been observed by the conductor and engineer, would have prevented a collision with another train, the employees on the latter train cannot recover damages for injuries resulting from disobedience of those instructions. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Doyle (1883) 60 Mia. 977.

If the coemployees of a conductor killed by the collision of his train with another, in consequence of the negligence of an agent of the railway company for whose acts it must answer, are also negligent, no action will lie against the company in favor of his representatives. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Snyder (1886) 117 Ill. 376, 7 N. E. 604 (instruction disapproved which left it open to the jury to infer that proof of the negligence of the company's agent, and the conductor's freedom from negligence, would alone justify a verdict against the company).

The negligence of an engineer in responding to a yardmaster's signal to back some cars, without first ascertaining whether a switchman, who had just undertaken to couple two of the cars which were to be moved, was clear of the cars, breaks the causal connection between the signal and an injury received by the switchman, by his being crushed between the cars when they came together a second time upon the trains being backed. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Touhy (1887) 26 Ill. App. 99.

b. Defects in structures or other dangers of the place of work.

In Allen v. New Gas Co. (1876) L. R. 1 Exch. Div. 251, 45 L. J. Exch. N. S. 668, 34 L. T. N. S. 541, a company had on its premises gates which were safe when open and wedged up, but liable to fall when closed. The attention of the manager had been directed to the unsafe condition of the gates, and orders had been given, but not carried out, to remedy this. A workman in the employ of the company passed through the gates when open, but on his return one of them was closed, and shortly afterwards, while he was working near the gates, they fell on and injured him. There was no evidence to show how this happened, nor any evidence that the manager and other persons employed by the company were incompetent. It was held that the company was not liable, as the negligence, if any, which caused the accident, was that of a fellow workman. "We think," said Huddleston, B., 54 L. R. A.

"that the mischief in this case arose from the conduct of the plaintiff's fellow workman as such, and not from the defendant's default [nor from the default of any manager or vice proprietor, and that, therefore, the defendants are not liable]. The gates were dangerous when shut, not dangerous when against the wall and wedged up. Now, either some workmen, as such, moved the gates, or the wind did so; and then the workmen ought to have replaced them. It was therefore by the improper moving of the gates by a workman, or by their being improperly left open by the workmen, that the mischief happened." The case is like this,—there is an unsafe ladder; it is shut up and not used; a workman takes it out and does not replace it, and then another workman uses it and is hurt. The master would not be liable.

In Collyer v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1886) 49 N. J. L. 59, 6 Atl. 438, where the plaintiff's claim was based on the theory that a heavy door was defectively constructed, the court, without discussing the question of concurrent negligence, refused to allow recovery on the ground that a fellow servant was negligent in handling the door.

The negligence of an employee in allowing a large hole to remain under the track of a railway, and not providing any light for it, is not the proximate cause of an injury which a servant receives through being caught in the hole while coupling cars against which the engineer has pushed back his locomotive without warning. Robertson v. Linlithgow Oil Co. (1891) 18 Ct. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 1221.

Even on the assumption that an unduly rough roadbed on a half-finished railway betokens negligence,—which is denied,—the company is not liable for an injury to one of its servants employed on a construction train, occasioned by the running of the train by the engineer at a reckless rate of speed. Evansville & R. B. Co. v. Henderson (1893) 134 Ind. 636, 33 N. E. 1021.

Where a log is thrown off a car by an excessive jolting upon a rough roadbed, and the car is consequently derailed, the inference, from evidence that the jolting was aggravated by an undue rate of speed, is that the negligence of the engineer was the efficient cause of the wreck; and none of the other trainmen can recover for injuries resulting therefrom. Conger v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. (1891) 86 Mich. 76, 49 N. W. 695.

In Sammon v. New York & H. R. Co. (1875) 62 N. Y. 251, the defendant was held not to be liable for an accident which occurred owing to the fact that an ill-fitting pin fell out of the lever of a switch while a train was passing, and allowed two cars to run onto wrong tracks, the court holding that, as the switchman, when he had neither resorted to the use of a crowbar to move the rails, as he had been doing before the switch was put in, nor held the lever himself, nor signaled the train to stop, nor taken steps to have the hole enlarged, the accident was attributable to the switchman's negligence alone.

If the owner of a mine has negligently allowed fire-damp to accumulate, and it is ignited by a servant who goes into it with a lighted lamp, instead of a safety lamp, contrary to the owner's orders, and another servant is injured by an explosion, the latter has no remedy against the owner. Berna v. Gaston Gas Coal Co. (1885) 27 W. Va. 285, 55 Am. Rep. 304.

Where an employee in a mine, a shaft of which was divided by a framework of posts into two departments, one of which was provided with a ladder for the use of the employees, was injured while ascending the ladder, by a timber negligently thrown into the shaft by a fellow employee, the mine owner is not liable, although the partition between the compartments may have been defectively constructed, or insufficient in other particulars. Kevern v. Providence Gold & Silver Min. Co. (1886) 70 Cal. 392, 11 Pac. 740.

In Hoffman v. Clough (1889) 124 Pa. 505, 17 Atl. 19, the defendant asked the court to instruct the jury "that, if they believed that some coemployee of the plaintiff, without the knowledge of the defendant, had left the covering off the well and in a dangerous condition, and the plaintiff fell in, the defendant has not been guilty of negligence, and therefore the plaintiff cannot recover." The answer of the trial judge was as follows: "I decline to affirm that point, because I can easily conceive that while an employee may contribute to the injury, yet if there is negligence in the defendant he would be responsible." The court said: "There are two objections to this answer. In the first place, when taken as a whole it is not responsive to the point. Instead of declaring the law applicable to the facts assumed, it dealt with other facts which the learned judge regarded as conceivable, but which were not brought to his attention, and which were inconsistent with those embodied in the point. In the next place, if regard be had to that part of the answer which is responsive, it is clearly wrong. The general doctrine that an employee cannot look to his employer for an injury resulting from the negligence of a coemployee is well settled."

c. Defects in machinery.

Supposing the use of a car with an unusually short draw-bar to be negligence on the part of a railway,—(which is denied),—a brakeman who is injured while obeying the order of the conductor to detach the car cannot recover, since the order is the negligence of a coservant and the proximate cause of the injury. Whitwam v. Wisconsin & M. R. Co. (1888) 58 Wis. 408, 17 N. W. 124.

A defective coupling which causes the separation of a train is not the proximate cause of an injury afterwards received by a brakeman through the backing of the forward part of the train upon him while he is engaged in remedying the defect. Course v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1888) 17 N. Y. S. R. 715, 2 N. Y. Supp. 312.

A defective condition of a drawbar on a freight car, allowing the deadwoods to come together, will not render a railroad company liable to a switchman whose arm is crushed between the deadwoods, where just before the accident his arm was thrown between them as he stumbled upon a piece of coal left upon the track through the negligence of fellow servants. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Mealer (1802) 1 C. C. A. 633, 6 U. S. App. 88, 50 Fed. 725.

A railroad brakeman cannot recover from his employer on the ground that the cars he was ordered to couple were of unequal height, even if the use of such cars is negligence, where the proximate cause of his injury was the negligent movement of the train by a fellow servant while he was attempting to make the coupling. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Brown (1895) 91 Va. 668, 22 S. E. 496.

A railroad company is not liable to a fireman for injuries from a collision of trains caused by the engineer's disobedience to orders as to the speed at which a station should be approached, where, although one of the brakes was out of order, the evidence was that the train could have been stopped without the brakes on the cars if the engineer had shut off steam at the point at which he should have done. Bull v. Mobile & M. R. Co. (1880) 67 Ala. 206.

The negligence of section hands in placing a water cask on the front end of a hand car in such a position that a jolt due to the car's being out of repair throws it off, in consequence of which the car is upset, is the negligence of fellow servants, and not of the section boss, where the latter gave mere general direction to prepare to return to the section house with the working tools and water cask. The want of repairs is not the efficient cause of such an accident, as it is due to the intervention of a new and distinct cause. Rose v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. (1891; Tex.) 17 S. W. 789.

On the ground that the master is not liable for the defective condition of instrumentalities which are harmless until they are rendered active for mischief by the independent wrongful act of a coservant of the injured person, it is held that the negligence of a railway company in not furnishing proper headlights is not the proximate cause of a collision caused by the recklessness of the engineer in moving the train from a siding out onto the main track, in violation of direct orders. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Perriguy (1894) 138 Ind. 414, 34 N. E. 283, 37 N. E. 976. The court said: "The movement of the train under the management of Ferris [the engineer] was the independent wrongful act of a responsible person. Such act of Ferris was not induced by the act of the appellant, nor did the act of Ferris so operate on the act of the appellant as to cause appellant's act to produce the injury. If it had so operated, according to the authority we have cited, responsibility would not attach to the appellant's act. The absence of the headlight was not the cause of the injury. Such absence was but an incident to the appellee's failure to avert the collision."

Where the cause of a workman's injury is the carelessness of the engineer in running certain machinery after a break which makes it dangerous, the workman has no cause of action against the common employer of both. Philadelphia Iron & Steel Co. v. Davis (1886) 111 Pa. 597, 56 Am. Rep. 805, 4 Atl. 513.

Where an engineer hoisted a bucket with plaintiff in it from a shaft with such speed as to throw it against the sheave, the court said that this was negligence irrespective of whether the bucket contained a man or not, and that it was therefore immaterial that the machinery for passing hoisting signals from the miners to the engineer was out of order and failed to work. Trewatha v. Buchanan Gold Min. & Mill. Co. (1892) 96 Cal. 495, 28 Pac. 571, 31 Pac. 561.

If an employee continues to use machinery after he knows it is unsafe, the master is relieved from responsibility for damages resulting to his fellow employees therefrom. Philadelphia Iron & Steel Co. v. Davis (1886) 111 Pa. 597, 56 Am. Rep. 305, 4 Atl. 513.

Where a foreman of a stevedore, having full charge of the loading and unloading of a vessel, called the attention of the mate of the ship to the unsafe character of a sling furnished by the vessel, and used in lowering cotton, the fact that the man at the gangway, whose duty it was to warn the men below when the cotton was on its way, failed to do so, is not, in admiralty, matter in discharge of the liability of the vessel, but only in mitigation of damages. The Phoenix (1888) 34 Fed. 760.

d. Unfitness of the delinquent coservant.

A coupler run over by cars which are being switched onto a siding cannot recover on the ground of the incompetency of his foreman where the evidence shows that the proximate cause of the injury was the carelessness of a fellow servant in prematurely cutting them off. Central R. Co. v. Keegan (1897) 27 C. C. A. 105, 51 U. S. App. 489, 52 Fed. 174.

An employer cannot be held liable for an injury to a servant, on the ground that it was due to the incompetency of a fellow servant, where the failure of such servant to start machinery is alleged to be the cause of the injury, and the evidence is that the foreman started it, and the servant was subsequently injured by having his arm caught in certain cog-wheels. McQuerty v. Hale (1894) 161 Mass. 51, 36 N. E. 682.

The negligence of a conductor in starting his train in violation of a rule requiring him to await orders at a station, and not his sickness, is the proximate cause of a collision which results from the starting of the train. Johnston v. Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. (1886) 114 Pa. 443, 7 Atl. 184.

A conductor's ignorance of the section of the road over which he was taking a train is not shown to have had any legal connection with an injury received by his fireman in a collision with cars which escaped from a siding, where the evidence is that they would not have done this if a fellow servant of the plaintiff had not violated a rule of the company in leaving them on the siding without setting the brakes. Cooper v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. (1898) 25 App. Div. 383, 49 N. Y. Supp. 481.

Upon familiar principles, it is also clear that the master's knowledge of the incompetency of the culpable servant is immaterial where the efficient cause of the injury is the negligence of the plaintiff himself in voluntarily and knowingly exposing himself to the dangers created by the act of the incompetent servant. Sheets v. Chicago & I. Coal R. Co. (1894) 139 Ind. 682, 39 N. E. 154, where a brakeman was killed in coupling cars which he knew to be moving at a dangerous rate of speed, and it was held that the master was not liable although he knew that the engineer was unfit for his position.

e. Inadequate number of servants.

The insufficiency of the number of men on a train will not render a railway company liable, where a brakeman is injured through the carelessness of another brakeman. Hayes v. Western R. Corp. (1849) 3 Cush. 270.

In Harvey v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1882) 88 N. Y. 481, the court thus replied to the contention that the neglect of the delinquent servant was to be attributed to the multifarious and conflicting duties imposed upon him by the defendant: "This assumption is completely overthrown by his own evidence, for he testifies that he left the switch and went to the telegraph office, sat down on a box, and was sitting there engaged in a conversation with the operator, when the train on which the deceased was a fireman passed him. This proves that his failure to close the switch cannot be attributed to the fact that, at this instant of time, he was called to the discharge of some other and conflicting duty. Having sufficient time to properly adjust the switch, and knowing well how to operate it, he went away leaving it open."

That the failure of a railway company to have the usual number of brakemen on a train at the time plaintiff was injured while making a coupling, because a wagon was left too near the track, was the proximate cause of the injury, cannot be predicated of a case where it was in full view of the fireman, and he might, if he had chosen, have warned the plaintiff. Connors v. Elmira, C. & N. R. Co. (1895) 92 Hun, 339, 36 N. Y. Supp. 926.

A collision which would have been avoided if a conductor had been sent with the train will not render the company liable to a servant injured by the collision, where the immediate cause of the accident was the fact that the engineer attempted to run to a certain station contrary to instructions. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Compton (1890) 75 Tex. 667, 13 S. W. 667.

f. Defective regulations.

The failure of a railroad company to provide, in addition to the usual night signal of waving a lantern, a system of oral orders for starting trains, cannot be made a ground of action where the evidence is that such an order was in fact given, and was not understood by the negligent servant. Feaslee v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1890) 152 Mass. 155, 25 N. E. 71.

The death of a brakeman and baggage master by collision was caused by the negligence of the engineer, and not by an unsafe schedule or defective rules, where the engineer of the colliding train received an order to run two hours late, but the schedule of the train struck would interfere with such order, and the general rule requires following trains to run ten minutes behind the time of the train followed. The consideration relied upon was that it was the duty of the trainmen of the colliding train to look out for the train in advance, although there was no special order. Kennelly v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1895) 166 Pa. 60, 80 Atl. 1014.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

Thomas S. GRIFFITH and Wife, Respts.,
v.

F. J. HOLMAN, Appt.

(23 Wash. 347.)

1. A private individual cannot abate a public nuisance consisting of a fence across a navigable stream, unless he has some special interest in the abatement different from and greater than the interest of the community.

2. A stream 40 feet wide and 4 feet deep at high water lasting about three months of the year, and at other times from 6 inches to 2 feet deep, and which has never been used for purposes of navigation except by rowboats to a limited extent for pleasure, is not a navigable stream.

3. The right of fishing in fresh water non-navigable streams is in the riparian owners.

T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Thompson (Fla.) 26 L. R. A. 410; Farmers' Co-Operative Mfg. Co. v. Alberman & R. R. Co. (N. C.) 29 L. R. A. 700; South Carolina S. B. Co. v. Wilmington, C. & A. R. Co. (S. C.) 38 L. R. A. 541; Mahler v. Brumder (Wis.) 31 L. R. A. 695; Miller v. Hare (W. Va.) 39 L. R. A. 491; and Blagen v. Smith (Or.) 44 L. R. A. 522.

4. The owner of the land on both sides of a non-navigable stream has a right to maintain a fence across it.

(December 3, 1900.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged trespass by defendant on plaintiffs' property, cutting a fence, and taking fish from a stream thereon. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. L. Edmiston, for appellant:

The facts are sufficient to show that the river in question is a navigable stream.

Haines v. Hall, 17 Or. 165, 3 L. R. A. 609, 20 Pac. 831; Nutter v. Gallagher, 19 Or. 375, 24 Pac. 250; Thunder Bay River Boom Co. v. Speechly, 31 Mich. 336, 18 Am. Rep. 184; Morgan v. King, 35 N. Y. 454, 91 Am. Dec. 58; Diedrich v. Northwestern Union R. Co. 42 Wis. 248, 24 Am. Rep. 399; East Hoquiam Boom & Logging Co. v. Neeson, 20 Wash. 142, 54 Pac. 1001; Carl v. West Aberdeen Land & Improv. Co. 13 Wash. 616, 43 Pac. 890; Gould, Waters, §§ 42, 107-110.

If the stream in question is a navigable stream the respondents had no right to put a fence of any kind across it, because the public at all times have a right to use it for all purposes for which nature made it applicable, and among those is the right to pass up and down said stream in a rowboat.

Ballinger, Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 7303.

Appellant was not a trespasser while in the boat fishing on the stream where it crosses respondents' land. The stream being navigable, the appellant had a perfect right to be upon it, and the right to go upon the stream carries with it the right to do all acts incident thereto, and among those is the right to catch fish from the waters of that stream.

Bodi v. Winous Point Shooting Club, 57 Ohio St. 226, 48 N. E. 844; Brown v. De Groff, 50 N. J. L. 409, 14 Atl. 219; Morris v. Graham, 16 Wash. 343, 47 Pac. 752; Gould, Waters, §§ 42, 47.

Mr. A. E. Gallagher, for respondents:

The stream in question is not navigable at common law, as by the common law navigable streams are confined to waters in which the tide ebbs and flows.

Lorman v. Benson, 8 Mich. 18, 77 Am. Dec. 435; Gould, Waters, § 42; Wood, Nuisances, 2d ed. § 451.

The burden of showing the stream navigable is on appellant.

Wood, Nuisances, 2d ed. § 463; East Hoquiam Boom & Logging Co. v. Neeson, 20 Wash. 142, 54 Pac. 1001.

A stream which can only be made navigable or floatable by artificial means is not a public highway.

East Hoquiam Boom & Logging Co. v. Neeson, 20 Wash. 142, 54 Pac. 1001; Nutter v. Gallagher, 19 Or. 375, 24 Pac. 250; Haines v. Hall, 17 Or. 165, 3 L. R. A. 609, 20 Pac. 831; Roue v. Granite Bridge Corp. 21 Pick. 344; The Montello, 24 Wall. 430, sub nom. United States v. The Montello, 22 L. ed. 54 L. R. A.

391; Burroughs v. Whitcam, 59 Mich. 279, 26 N. W. 491; Wethersfield v. Humphrey, 20 Conn. 218; American River Water Co. v. Amaden, 6 Cal. 443; Gould, Waters, § 107; United States v. Rio Grande Dam & Irrig. Co. 9 N. M. 292, 51 Pac. 674; Hubbard v. Bell, 54 Ill. 110, 5 Am. Rep. 98; Weise v. Smith, 3 Or. 445, 8 Am. Rep. 621; Grand Rapids Boom Co. v. Jarvis, 30 Mich. 308; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 243, 244.

There could be no pretense of right or excuse for appellant's trespassing upon respondent's land, and cutting the wire fence, or taking the fish in question.

The appellant is liable for damages for removing the fence, even if it were a public nuisance, so long as he did not sustain special injury from it which gave him the right to abate it of his own motion.

Waters v. Lilley, 4 Pick. 145, 16 Am. Dec. 333; Gould, Waters, § 499.

Dunbar, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought by the respondents to recover of appellant $250 as damages which respondents sustained by reason of the appellant cutting a wire fence on the land of respondents in Spokane county, where such wire crossed the stream known as the "Little Spokane river," which flows through the land of respondents; and also to recover of the appellant the sum of $250, the value of certain trout fish which appellant caught in said Little Spokane river while in a boat on said river on respondents' land where said river runs across the land of respondents, and which said fish appellant took and converted to his own use. A demurrer interposed to the amended complaint was overruled. Defendant (appellant) refusing to plead further, the court made findings of fact and conclusions of law in accordance with the allegations of the amended complaint, and gave judgment in favor of plaintiffs (respondents) and against defendant for $500 and costs.

The findings of fact following substantially the allegations of the complaint, it is necessary to examine only the allegations of the complaint, under the first assignment of error, that the court erred in overruling the demurrer of defendant to the amended complaint, although assignments of error are based upon the conclusions of law. It is conceded by the appellant that only two propositions are involved, viz.: (1) Did the respondents have a legal right to place on their land the barbed-wire fence in question across the stream, so as to prevent the passage of rowboats? and (2) Did the appellant have a right to catch fish in the stream on respondents' land, he being in a rowboat, as alleged in the amended complaint? The complaint alleges in the usual manner the trespass and the catching of the fish, the ownership of the land, and that said stream had never been meandered, and gives the following description of the stream: "That said Little Spokane river, where the same runs through, over, and across the premises described, and for 10 miles up said river from said premises, and down said river from said premises to the mouth of said Little Spokane river, during high water in said river, the water therein is of an average width of 40 feet, and on an average during said time of 4 feet in depth; that high water continues at various stages in height in said river for about three months during each year, and the water in said river at said premises and up and down said river from said premises for the distance above stated during the rest of each year for the last twenty years has been about 40 feet in width and 2 feet in depth; that the depth and width of the water in said river for the distance above mentioned varies at different places in said river at all seasons of the year, the water in said river at places becoming wider than as above stated, and at places as low as 6 inches in depth; that said river from a point about 10 miles above the premises above described to its mouth carries at all seasons of the year sufficient water in width and depth so as to permit the running of rowboats of the usual size up and down said river; that no part of said river has ever been used as a navigable stream or highway for any purpose whatever, except that said river has been used to a limited extent for the purpose of pleasure by the running of rowboats up and down said river by persons desiring to fish for pleasure in said river." It alleges the maintenance by the plaintiffs of the barbed-wire fence above mentioned, the catching of the fish by the defendant without any authority, and the appropriation of the same to defendant's use. It is contended by the appellant that the stream was a navigable stream, and that, therefore, the defendant had a right to navigate the stream, and to fish therein; and that the respondents had no right to put a fence of any kind across it which would interfere with the right of the public to use it for all purposes for which nature made it applicable,—citing in support of this contention § 7303, Ballinger, Anno. Codes & Statutes, which is a statute to prevent the obstruction of navigable waters in this state; and that, the fence being a public nuisance, the appellant had a right to abate it. But, even conceding, for the purpose of the discussion, that the stream was a navigable one, the principle of law is well established that a public nuisance can be abated only by a public officer, except where the party who desires to abate it has some special interest in the abatement which is different from and greater than the interest of the community. The cases which the appellant cites from this court to sustain his contention are squarely opposed to him. Thus, in Carl v. West Aberdeen Land & Improv. Co. 13 Wash. 616, 43 Pac. 890, the right to abate the nuisance was founded upon a special interest; the court in that case saying: "Under this assignment of error it is further contended that the obstruction was a public one; but, even if it was, the plaintiffs showed that they were so situated that they had a special private interest in having it removed, so that they could pass their logs down the river, and for that reason were entitled to maintain their action for that purpose." Even this case was where there was an action to abate the nuisance, and not an attempt by the party to abate it himself. The citation from Gould, Waters, § 42, does not seem to us to affect the question in any way. That special damages must be shown, see Jones v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 16 Wash. 25, 47 Pac. 226; Stufflebeam v. Montgomery, 2 Idaho, 763, 26 Pac. 125; Esson v. Wattier, 25 Or. 7, 34 Pac. 766; Wood, Nuisances, 3d ed. § 646, and cases cited in note 4. But we are of the opinion from the allegations of the complaint that the river was non-navigable. Hence it becomes necessary to ascertain the rights of riparian owners. The title to the land under all the navigable waters of this state passed from the sovereignty of the United States to the sovereignty of the state upon the admission of the state to the Union; but, under the well-established law of the land, the title to the land under the non-navigable waters passes from the United States to the grantee of the upland bounding on such non-navigable waters as an incident to such grant; and, although at the common law the test of the navigability is the ebb and flow of the tide, yet, especially in this country, it is held that the rivers and streams above the ebb and flow of the tide, which have sufficient capacity for useful navigation, are public rivers, and subject to the same general rights which the public possesses in navigable waters. But we are clearly of the opinion that the stream under consideration is a non-navigable stream. Many of the authorities which we will cite in support of this contention support also the other propositions indicated above, and they will, therefore be cited indiscriminately.

"A stream is a public highway wherever it is suitable in its natural condition for general use in travel or in the transportation of property." Gould, Waters, § 107. "If the stream is not always navigable, it must be capable of floatage, as the result of natural causes, at periods ordinarily recurring from year to year, and continuing for a sufficient length of time in each year to make it useful as a highway. The mere possibility of occasional use during brief or extraordinary freshets does not give it a public character. A similar principle applies in the case of small tidal creeks, in which, although prima facie they are public and navigable, private property may be maintained. It is not every small creek in which a fishing skiff or gunning canoe can be made to float at high tide which is deemed subject to public use, but, in order to have a public character, it must be navigable for some purpose useful to business or pleasure." Id. § 109. "But, while the common law only regarded those streams in which the tide ebbed and flowed to the extent of such flow and reflux as navigable, yet there was another class of streams, called fresh-water streams, which, if susceptible of navigation by 'boats and lighters,' or, as it would seem, for any beneficial public purpose, and were navigable in fact, were regarded as highways over which the public had free access for the purposes of trade and commerce. The only real distinction between the two classes of streams arose from the distinction as to the ownership of the alveus of the stream, and the rights of riparian owners therein. In all salt-water streams subject to the action of the tides the King not only owned the alveus, but had exclusive title in and jurisdiction over the stream for all purposes not inconsistent with navigation; while in fresh-water streams the riparian owner had certain special privileges of which the King could not deprive him. He had the exclusive right of fishery, the benefit of alluvial deposits or accretion, the right to erect wharves which did not impede navigation, and to take tolls for the use of them; and, in fact, a right to make any use of the water or the bed of the stream that his tastes or interests dictated that did not interfere with the public right of passage. Therefore, when it is said that by the common law no stream is regarded as navigable except those in which the tide ebbs and flows, it is not meant that no other streams are burdened with a public easement of passage, but that in law, and irrespective of the question of fact, all such streams are navigable whether they are so in fact or not, and that the title thereto, with all privileges, vests in the King; and that all other streams navigable in fact are highways for the passage of boats, but the title to which, with all special privileges, outside of the public easement, vests in the owner of the banks." 1 Wood, Nuisances, 3d ed. § 452. So that it would seem in this case that, even conceding that the stream, which is a fresh-water stream, be a navigable or public river, yet the right of fishing remained in the owner of the banks, the public having only an easement over the land, and the taking of the fish therefrom would be a trespass for which the owner would be entitled to damages. It is true, the fact that a stream is not considered does not establish the fact that it is a non-navigable stream, but probably indicates that in the minds of the officers ordering the survey it was not a navigable stream. It is well established that, except in salt-water streams, the question of navigability is one of fact that must be established by those who seek to use it as such; and it is also well established that the stream must be navigable in its natural state, unaided by artificial means or devices. This proposition was announced by this court in East Hoquiam Boom & Logging Co. v. Neeson, 20 Wash. 142, 54 Pac. 1001, where

It was said: "It is well settled that a stream which can only be made navigable or floatable by artificial means is not a public highway;" citing many cases to sustain the proposition. In Rouse v. Granite Bridge Corp. 21 Pick. 344, Chief Justice Shaw, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Nor is it every small creek in which a fishing skiff or gunning canoe can be made to float at high water which is deemed navigable. But, in order to have this character, it must be navigable to some purpose useful to trade or agriculture." In Nutter v. Gallagher, 19 Or. 375, 24 Pac. 250,—a case which is cited by appellant,—it is held that a stream or watercourse, in order to be navigable, must be of sufficient extent and capacity to enable the community at large to utilize it in the navigation of boats and other water craft thereon for the transportation of products and other merchandise, or for the purpose of floating logs and timber from forests to market. In the case of The Montello, 20 Wall. 430, sub nom. United States v. The Montello, 22 L. ed. 391, where the language of Chief Justice Shaw, supra, was repeated and indorsed, it was said that "the capability of use by the public for purposes of transportation and commerce affords the true criterion of the navigability of a river, rather than the extent and manner of that use." It was held in Haines v. Hall, 17 Or. 165, 3 L. R. A. 609, 20 Pac. 831, that a stream which has floatable capacity at certain periods recurring with regularity, and continuing for a sufficient length of time to make it useful as a highway for floating logs, is navigable; but to be navigable in this sense it must be capable of such floatage as is of practical utility and benefit to the public as a highway for trade and commerce. It was further said: "If its location is such, and its length and capacity so limited, that it will only accommodate but a few persons, it cannot be considered a navigable stream for any purpose. It must be so situated, and have such length and capacity, as will enable it to accommodate the public generally as a means of transportation." To the same effect is Burroughs v. Whitwam, 59 Mich. 279, 26 N. W. 491. The court, in Wethersfield v. Humphrey, 20 Conn. 218, in passing upon the question of whether certain waters were navigable, after reciting the fact that at times a fish boat, or skiff, or Indian canoe might have been pushed through the waters, said: "But this is not navigation. That only is such, and those only are navigable waters, where the public pass and repass upon them, with vessels or boats, in the prosecution of useful occupations. There must be some commerce or navigation which is essentially valuable,"—citing Lord Hale's remarks in his treatise De Jure Maris: "There be some streams or rivers that are private, not only in property and ownership, but also in use; as little streams and rivers that are not a common passage for the King's property." To the same effect is 54 L. R. A.

American River Water Co. v. Amsden, 6 Cal. 443. In that case it was held: "A river beyond the ebb and flow of the tide may be navigable when it has sufficient depth and width to float a vessel used in the transportation of freight or passengers, and this has been extended to its capacity to float rafts of lumber. To go beyond this, and declare a stream navigable which can float a log, would be to turn a rule intended for the benefit of the public into an instrument of serious detriment to individuals, if not of actual private oppression." "It should be understood that, except in salt-water streams, so far as the tide ebbs and flows, the question of navigability is one of fact, and must be established by those who seek to use it as such; and also that the stream must be navigable in its natural state, unaided by artificial means or devices. If a stream is not susceptible of valuable use to the public as a navigable or floatable stream, without the erection of dams, it is not a navigable stream, even though it might be applied to that use after dams are erected." 1 Wood, Nuisances, 3d ed. § 463. There is no claim here that the stream under discussion was ever used as a floatable stream, or that any transportation has been carried on over it except in small boats, from which persons fished for pleasure.

The legislature of this state has provided that the common law, so far as it is not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, or of the state of Washington, or incompatible with the institutions and condition of society of this state, shall be the rule of decision in all the courts of this state. The common-law rule having been adopted, it must be held that the title to the beds of non-navigable streams is in the adjacent riparian proprietors to the center of the stream. This holding is not inconsistent nor incompatible with the institutions and condition of society in this state, nor with the Constitution and laws of the United States or of the state of Washington. It was held by this court in Benton v. Johnson, 17 Wash. 277, 39 L. R. A. 107, 49 Pac. 495, that the common-law doctrine declaratory of riparian rights is not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States or of this state, or incompatible with the conditions of society in this state, "unless," said the court, "it can be said that the right of an individual to use and enjoy his own property is incompatible with our condition." The statute law and the decisions of this court, then, having made the common law the arbitrator of the rights of the riparian proprietors, the decisions of the courts declaring the rights of riparian proprietors under the common law become important. In Hooker v. Cummings, 20 Johns. 90, 11 Am. Dec. 249, it was said: "In the case of People v. Platt, 17 Johns. 195, 8 Am. Dec. 382, . . . we recognized the principles of the common law to be that in case of a private river—that is, where it is a fresh-water river—in which the tide does not ebb and flow, and is not, therefore, an arm of the sea, he who owns the soil has, prima facie, the right of fishing; and, if the soil on both sides be owned by an individual, he has the sole and exclusive right." See also Palmer v. Mulligan, 3 Cal. 307, 2 Am. Dec. 270. In Adams v. Pease, 2 Conn. 481, it was held that "the owners of land adjoining Connecticut river above the flowing and ebbing of the tide have an exclusive right of fishery, opposite to their land, to the middle of the river; and the public have an easement in the river as a highway for passing and repassing with every kind of water craft." "The bed and banks of a fresh-water river, where the tide does not ebb and flow, are the property of the riparian proprietors, the public having an easement only for passage as on a public highway; and such proprietors may use the land or water of the river in any way not inconsistent with this easement." Chenango Bridge Co. v. Paige, 83 N. Y. 178 (Syl.), 38 Am. Rep. 407. In Atty. Gen. ex rel. Muskegon Boom Co. v. Ewart Boom Co. 34 Mich. 462, among other things it was said, in substance, by Judge Cooley, who rendered the decision of the court, that the Muskegon river was not a navigable stream, and the public had no rights whatever in the soil under it; that it was only a small stream, whose value to the public consisted in the use that could be made of it for the purpose of floating logs and lumber; and it was held that the property taken in such a case was private property, and the owner of the bank could maintain trespass or ejectment against the taker. See June v. Purcell, 36 Ohio St. 396. In McFarlin v. Essex Co. 10 Cush. 304, it was said by Chief Justice Shaw, speaking for the supreme court of Massachusetts, that it was well established as law of the commonwealth that in all waters not navigable in the common-law sense of the term the right of fishery is in the owner of the soil upon which it is carried on, and in such rivers that the right of the soil is in the owner of the land bounding upon it; citing Waters v. Lilley, 4 Pick. 145, 16 Am. Dec. 333, and Com. v. Chapin, 5 Pick. 199. In Lincoln v. Davis, 53 Mich. 375, 51 Am. Rep. 116, 19 N. W. 103, it was held by the supreme court of Michigan that the law was well settled that riparian proprietors upon fresh-water streams had the exclusive right of fishing in the water opposite their land; citing Gould, Waters, § 182, and cases cited in note 1; Angell, Watercourses, § 61; Hart v. Hill, 1 Whart. 124; Beckman v. Kreamer, 43 Ill. 447. The citation from Gould, Waters, § 182, is as follows: "Riparian proprietors upon the fresh-water streams have the exclusive right of fishing in the water opposite their lands, and this right extends to navigable fresh rivers as well as those which are unnavigable, where the soil of the former is held to be private property. Riparian proprietors upon all such streams, whose title extends ad flum aquæ, can maintain an action of trespass against those who draw a seine between the center of the stream and the bank of his land." It is true that the legislature of the state has passed laws regulating fishing, has made close seasons, and provided a penalty for persons killing fish by use of dynamite or other explosives. It is also true that fish are feræ naturæ, and that their habitat is not entirely local; hence it might be thought that no property in fish could vest in the owner of the land. But it is ownership subject to the rights of the public, and must be exercised with due consideration for the nature of the property, and exercised only when the fish are upon the land of the owner. In accordance with this view, it was held in State v. Roberts, 59 N. H. 256, 47 Am. Rep. 199, that, while the right of fishery in waters not navigable was limited to the riparian owner of the soil, and belonged exclusively to him, yet this right in the owner of the land must be regarded as qualified to a certain extent by the universal principle that all property is held subject to those general regulations which are necessary to the common good and general welfare, and to that extent it was subject to legislative control; that it is a well-established principle that every person shall so use and enjoy his own property, however absolute and unqualified his title, that his use of it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the public. Hence, while the riparian owner has the exclusive right of fishery upon his own land, he must so exercise that right as not to injure others in the enjoyment of a right upon their lands upon the stream above and below. But, subject to these qualifications, the right of fishery to the riparian owner is absolute. To the same effect are Beach v. Morgan, 67 N. H. 529, 41 Atl. 349; Brookhaven v. Strong, 60 N. Y. 56; Holyoke Water-Power Co. v. Lyman, 15 Wall. 500, 21 L. ed. 133; Sterling v. Jackson, 69 Mich. 488, 37 N. W. 845; Washington Ice Co. v. Shortall, 101 Ill. 46, 40 Am. Rep. 196; Brown v. Bressler, 64 Ill. 488; Oobb v. Davenport, 33 N. J. L. 223, 97 Am. Dec. 718; New England Trout & Salmon Club v. Mather, 68 Vt. 338, 33 L. R. A. 569, 35 Atl. 323; Norcross v. Griffiths, 65 Wis. 599, 56 Am. Rep. 642, 27 N. W. 606.

It appearing from the record in the case that the river from which these fish were taken was non-navigable, that the owners had a right to maintain a fence over the same, and that they had the exclusive right of fishery in the waters flowing over the land, and no proper exceptions having been taken to the finding in relation to the amount of damages, the judgment will be affirmed.

SPOKANE STREET-RAILWAY COM-

1. Two and a half miles an hour cannot, as matter of law, be said not to be an excessive speed for an electric street car, when it meets, at a busy street crossing, another car on a parallel track, where its mechanism for controlling the current is defective.
2. The duty of a street-car company, in the exercise of ordinary care in respect to the management of a car approaching a person crossing its tracks, cannot be measured by the condition of the equipment and apparatus of the car at the time, without considering the effect of the fact that the appliances for stopping it were defective.
3. Failure to look and listen before crossing an electric street railway is not negligence per se.
4. The question of negligence in permitting electric cars to meet and pass at a street crossing is one of fact in the light of all the evidence in the case.
5. A street-railway company is negligent in operating an electric car with a defective controller handle, so that the car cannot be stopped with the same facility as if the appliance was sound.
6. The question whether or not a boy ten years old is guilty of negligence contributing to his injury is for the jury, where at a street crossing he attempts to ride a bicycle across the tracks, and in so doing passes behind one car and comes immediately in front of another approaching from the opposite direction, which, because of its defective condition, cannot be stopped in time to avoid collision with him.
7. If the negligence of a street-car company with respect to the condition or management of its car is the proximate cause of a collision with a traveler on the highway, it will be liable for the injury, although want of ordinary care on the part of the traveler is a condition of the accident.

(November 28, 1900.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The doctrine of comparative negligence had its origin in the state of Illinois, but has been repudiated in that state.

Beach, Contrib. Neg. 3d ed. § 85a.

It has also been repudiated in the state of Kansas, where it was once applied.

The general rule as to the operation of electric railways is that the company must exercise ordinary care, that is, such care as a reasonably prudent man would exercise, commensurate with the necessities of each case, having in view the instrument he is operating, the possibility of danger from its operation, and due regard for the rights of others, whether on foot or in vehicles.

Joyce, Electric Law, § 571; Booth, Street Railways, §§ 309, 311, 317; Cogswell v. West Street & N. E. R. Co. 5 Wash. 54, 31 Pac. 411.

Evidence of the motorman on the car was to the effect that he had the car under perfect control, and, consequently, the speed of the car was not high, dangerous, or excessive, and it should have been so determined by the court as a matter of law.

The controller handle was only provided for use in stopping the car under ordinary circumstances, and was not provided for emergency cases. The emergency lever was in perfect condition, so, also, were the brakes, and if there was any failure in this respect it was a mere condition before the accident, and not a contributing cause to the injury.

If respondent, without warning, and under circumstances which could not reasonably be expected, darted suddenly in front of, or against, or in close proximity to, the car, no recovery could be had, unless there was negligence after the discovery of his peril.

Respondent was guilty of want of ordinary care in not looking before going upon the south track immediately in front of a moving car. He was likewise negligent in failing to wait for a temporary obstruction to pass out of the way so that he could see such car.

Appellant did not put respondent in peril, and the latter would never have been in danger or peril had he exercised ordinary, or any, care.

No allowance is made in favor of one whose own fault has brought him into the peril which disturbs his judgment.

The defective controller handle cannot be deemed the proximate or immediate cause of the accident, unless prior want of care in that respect was the cause of the collision, accident, and injury.

The facts in the case at bar do not show knowledge of peril or wilful injury.

Contributory negligence is a complete defense to everything short of wilfulness or wantonness.

Messrs. C. S. Voorhees, Reese H. Voorhees, and Albert Allen, for respondent:

The injury inflicted upon the respondent, for which no adequate compensation can ever be made, was solely attributable to the monstrous negligence of the appellant in sending out a car so illy equipped with appliances as to be a standing menace to the security of life and limb.

Roth v. Union Depot Co. 13 Wash. 525, 31 L. R. A. 855, 43 Pac. 641, 44 Pac. 253.

Consolidated Traction Co. v. Scott, 58 N. J. L. 682, 33 L. R. A. 122, 34 Atl. 1094.

The presence of the respondent upon appellant's track, immediately prior to the infliction of the injury, in view of the fact that the car could and would have been stopped in time to avert such injury but for the negligence of appellant in furnishing the car with the defective controller handle, if negligence at all, was "only a remote cause, or a mere condition" of the injury, and the appellant's negligence was the proximate cause thereof.

That the appellant, in the case at bar, knowingly permitted the operation of the defective car, is unerringly established by the evidence. The knowledge of the employees, whose duty it was to report defects to the company, was the knowledge of the company.

In view of its defective condition, it was not "consistent with prudence" for appellant to operate car No. 18 upon the streets of a populous city like Spokane at all, and to operate such a car at any rate of speed whatever was equivalent to operating it at a "high and dangerous rate of speed."

Dickens v. New York C. R. Co. 13 How. Pr. 230; Diamond Block Coal Co. v. Edmonson, 14 Ind. App. 594, 43 N. E. 242.

Reavis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, by his guardian ad litem, commenced an action against defendant, a street-railway company of Spokane, for personal injuries sustained through negligence of the company, and alleged that Spokane was a city with a population of over 30,000; that Riverside avenue, where the injury occurred, was one of the principal thoroughfares and public streets of the city, on which a large amount of business was transacted, and across which all the people of the city were accustomed and had a right to travel; that, by reason of the public use of the street, it was the duty of the defendant to use great care and caution in keeping its cars and machinery in proper condition and repair, as well as great caution in the operation and running of the cars over its tracks on Riverside avenue; that for a long time prior to the injury of plaintiff the defendant carelessly and negligently used and operated a car upon Riverside avenue which was broken, defective, and out of repair, in that the controller handle thereon (being the handle used for the purpose of turning the current of electricity off and on and controlling the car) was broken, and on account of such defect the power of the motor-man operating the car, to control and regulate the current of electricity and to control the car in case of an emergency, was rendered uncertain; that by reason thereof it was dangerous to operate such defective car upon the street; that defendant was careless and negligent in operating such car in such dangerous and defective condition; that defendant at the time of the injury was running such car at a high and dangerous rate of speed along one of its tracks on Riverside avenue, meeting another car coming in the opposite direction on a parallel track, causing the two cars to meet and pass each other at a point where Riverside avenue is crossed by another public street, and which point of crossing was much frequented by public travel with teams, bicycles, and on foot; and that on the 8th of May, 1895, while plaintiff was lawfully traveling with a bicycle along, upon, and across Riverside avenue, at the crossing of the streets at the time of the meeting of the cars, he was caught, knocked down, and run over by the defective car and severely injured. Defendant answered the complaint, denying its negligence, and setting up that the injury, if any, received by plaintiff was caused directly, proximately, and solely by his fault and negligence, and without any fault or negligence of defendant, and that the father and guardian ad litem and the mother of plaintiff were guilty of contributory negligence, causing the injury, in allowing the minor plaintiff to escape beyond their custody and control.

In mentioning the facts established at the trial, where the evidence is conflicting only those facts will be considered which are substantially shown from the evidence adduced by plaintiff. At the time the injury occurred the plaintiff was between ten years and ten years and nine months old. He was a boy of average capacity of that age, was accustomed to ride a bicycle in the streets of Spokane, and knew it was dangerous to collide with a street car in motion in the streets while riding his bicycle. Prior to the accident he was holding to the west-bound car, in riding his bicycle, until within about a block and a half of the place where the accident occurred. The east-bound car, which collided with plaintiff, was running at a speed of about 2½ miles per hour. If the plaintiff had looked before going on the track of the defendant in front of the east-bound car, he could not have seen the car in time to avoid the collision. The motorman on the east-bound car rang his bell to salute the passing west-bound car prior to the accident, but just how far distant does not appear. The motorman did not see the plaintiff on the bicycle in time to avoid the collision. The motorman had been in the employ of the defendant company for about two years and was shown to have experience and capacity. He testified, in substance, that the car had eight wheels, was about 32 feet long, with motors of the Thomson-Houston system, and that it was controlled by an upright controller in front, the reverse and controller lever resting on the same stand, but not on the same staff (that is, on the outside pipe); that there was one pipe for the controller part; that the center staff was the controlling staff, known as the "rheostat," which ran down to the bottom of the car on the front end to a sprocket, and down to the sprocket wheel, so as to control the connections underneath, known as the "rear connection," by a sliding contact; that on the same stand was the controller lever; that the controller lever had an upright handle; that there was a steel or wire spindle that went down from the lever that came out on the steel spindle; that each was worked by a loose handle, and, the handle being held tightly, it would turn on the spindle and connect the sliding contact that was on the rheostat, which was about a half circle, and connected with a cable and sprocket: that the purpose of the controller handle was to start and stop the car by the connection underneath; that the reverse lever was one that came out on the same plan as the controller lever only that it had no upright handle to it; that there was an overhead switch above the motorman's head, known as a "cut-off," to either connect the electricity with the motors or disconnect it; that there were brakes on the car; that the controller or controller handle was the appliance ordinarily used for starting and stopping the car; that it had an upright handle of brass, and a steel or iron rod that went through and riveted underneath; that at the time the controller handle or upright grip that was used to turn on and off the electricity for the motors was wired on with a piece of baling wire, and that the rod of wire or steel that went down through the handle slipped from the staff; that the staff was brass, and there was a hole through the end of it, and the rod went through that hole and was ordinarily riveted underneath, but in this car the constant working of the hard metal on the brass had worn the hole so that it allowed the rod to pull through, and it had thus been wired in order to hold it on (that is, to hold the rod in the proper place). The motorman saw the plaintiff about halfway between the two tracks, a foot or two in advance of the front end of the car. He put his hand on the controller handle, released about a half turn of the controller staff to throw off the current, and at the same time put on the brake, but, in making the motion to throw off the current with the controller handle, the handle fell over and prevented him using the reverse lever. The reverse lever was nearly under the disabled controller handle. His next effort to throw off the electricity was by the overhead switch. The northeast corner of the car struck the boy's bicycle and knocked him forward 3 or 4 feet. He saw the boy fall, but could not specify at what distance he was from the car when he struck the ground. When the car was stopped, plaintiff was lying across the north rail, and his left leg under the drive wheel of the car. The track at the time was dry, and slightly inclined to be upgrade. The motorman stated that he made an immediate effort to stop the car when he saw the plaintiff. He says that as soon as he saw the plaintiff he made an effort to throw the current out of the car with the controller, and the handle broke,—pulled out of the socket,—because wired down. Then he made an effort for the reverse lever, and it came in contact with the disabled controller handle. He then threw the overhead switch, and disconnected the current from the trolley wire to the motors. At the time the plaintiff was struck, the front wheel of the car was on or near the west crosswalk or a little west of him. With the controller in good condition, the motorman stated, "the car could have been stopped under the circumstances, considering the place and rate of speed, very nearly instantly." He also said the disabled controller prevented his operating it, and prevented him from operating the reverse lever successfully. He also said that the plaintiff would not have gone under the front end of the car had the controller been in sound condition. The motorman was corroborated by other railway employees of experience in his statement that if the controller had been in sound condition the car, under the circumstances, could have been stopped almost immediately; some of them stating 2 or 3 feet as the limit. It was also shown that the defect in the controller had existed for some time, and was known to the officers of the company. The plaintiff, in company with another boy, had been following the west-bound car, which was a box car, for some distance. He and his companion had been riding behind the box car on their bicycles, each having hold of the end of the car, until within about a block and a half of the crossing where the accident occurred. They had then ridden along the street some 6 feet north of the track, still following within a short distance of the west-bound car, until near the place of the accident, when the companion of plaintiff turned south and crossed the two parallel tracks, inviting plaintiff, by gesture or voice, to follow him. The plaintiff, a few feet behind the west bound car, turned, going south, diagonally. Plaintiff testified he was about 6 feet back of the west-bound car and 6 feet towards the north, when his companion left him, and he was about 3 feet behind the west-bound car when he crossed the track southward. When he got between the two parallel tracks he saw the east-bound car. He says he was then going diagonally southwest, and he immediately turned to the southeast to avoid the collision, when he was struck by the east-bound car, and knocked to the front of the car some little distance; that he was riding at an ordinary rate of speed upon his bicycle, and had slackened a little when he crossed the railway track, but attempted to ride more quickly, to cross ahead of the car. The jury found that the car, after the collision, stopped within 14 feet.

1. Counsel for defendant requested that the jury be instructed to find for the defendant. Of the several instructions requested by counsel for defendant which were refused by the court, mention will be made here of such as are deemed material. The court was requested to instruct that the allegations of the complaint confined the alleged negligent acts of the defendant to defective controller handle, excessive, dangerous, and high rate of speed, and cars passing at and on the intersection of the two streets, and that the evidence disclosed that the car was not running at a high, dangerous, or excessive rate of speed. The court, of its own motion, instructed as follows: "There are but three acts of negligence alleged which you are allowed to consider: First, the use and operation on Riverside avenue of a car with a defective controller handle; second, running said car with such controller handle at a high and dangerous rate of speed while meeting another car going in an opposite direction on a parallel track; . . . third, permitting the cars to pass at a street crossing." The refusal of defendant's instruction as tendered is not erroneous. The court could not, under all the circumstances surrounding the accident, determine, as a matter of law, that the rate of speed was not excessive. "It is well settled that at crossings street cars and pedestrians have equal rights to the use of the streets and it has been held in that connection that what is proper care and caution on the part of those in charge of cars to prevent accidents is a question of fact in each case. Schulman v. Houston, W. Street & P. Ferry R. Co. 15 Misc. 30, 36 N. Y. Supp. 439. . . . The facts in the present case, to say the least, fairly raised a question for the jury, whether the defendant was in the exercise of due and reasonable caution when it permitted its south-bound car to pass the standing car at that public crossing, and at such a rate of speed, under the circumstances. In forming a judgment upon that question, there were subsidiary questions equally calling for consideration and judgment, such as, Was it the duty of the motorman, in the exercise of due and proper care, as he approached the standing car, which would obstruct his view of passengers or pedestrians who might be waiting to pass, to sound his bell or gong as a warning; and did he so sound his bell or gong; and should he have had his car under control at this crossing; and did he have it under such control when approaching the standing car? These facts, and the inferences to be fairly drawn from them, under the principle before alluded to, it seems to me, clearly were matters for the jury, exclusively." Consolidated Traction Co. v. Scott, 58 N. J. L. 632, 33 L. R. A. 122, 34 Atl. 1094. The evidence had disclosed defective appliances in the control of the car, so that it could not be so speedily stopped as where the machinery for operation was in sound condition. Safety in the rate of speed is nearly always relative. In Penny v. Rochester R. Co. 7 App. Div. 595, 40 N. Y. Supp. 172, it was held: "As it was the defendant's duty to have its cars under control at street crossings the jury had a right to consider the question whether the car could have been stopped more easily if the sand box, approved for use under such circumstances, had been filled with sand." Whether the collision between the infant plaintiff and the car was unavoidable or inevitable was properly submitted to the jury. Counsel also requested an instruction that if the evidence showed that the bells and gongs had been sounded, and the car was running at slow and moderate speed, and plaintiff, without warning, under circumstances which were not reasonably to be expected, darted suddenly in front of or against or in close proximity to the car, then the defendant would be liable only for the use of ordinary care after discovering the infant plaintiff, with such car, equipment, and apparatus as the defendant and its motorman then had for stopping the car, if the motorman did all he could with the car and equipment at that time, after discovering the position or danger of the infant plaintiff, then the verdict should be for defendant. The element of error in this proposed instruction is that the duty of the defendant in the exercise of ordinary care was measured by the condition of the equipment and apparatus of the car at the time of the accident. It omits defective appliances for stopping the car. Counsel requested the charge that, if the plaintiff failed to stop, look, and listen, or take any reasonable precaution to ascertain whether a car was coming east, it was contributory negligence. The court gave the following instruction: "You are instructed that the plaintiff is required to use ordinary care,—that is, such care as an ordinarily prudent person would use under the facts and circumstances detailed in this case, taking into consideration the age, capacity, knowledge, and experience of the infant plaintiff; and he is required to use the same care as the average careful and prudent boy of his age, capacity, prudence, and knowledge. If you find that he possessed such knowledge, capacity, and experience, and knew it was dangerous to pass immediately in front of a moving street car, and that he attempted to do so without looking and listening, when, if he had done so, he would have discovered the car in time to have avoided the accident complained of, the presumption is that he was guilty of contributory negligence." It is not negligence per se if it is not shown that one looked and listened in crossing a street railway. The degree of care required in crossing a highway and steam railway in looking up and down the track, is not necessarily the test of care required in crossing the track of a street railway on a public street. Failure to look and listen before crossing the tracks of an electric railway in a public street, where the cars have not exclusive right of way, is not negligence, as a matter of law. Robbins v. Springfield Street R. Co. 165 Mass. 30, 42 N. E. 334; Consolidated Traction Co. v. Scott, 58 N. J. L. 682, 33 L. R. A. 122, 34 Atl. 1094; Shea v. St. Paul City R. Co. 50 Minn. 395, 52 N. W. 902. Counsel for defendant also requested the instruction that if the plaintiff was guilty of an act of negligence which directly contributed to the injury, or of any lack of ordinary care on his part, or an omission to do what he ought to have done under the circumstances, which act or omission directly contributed to the accident, it would defeat a recovery. We think the instruction attempts to refine the rule of ordinary care which was imposed on the plaintiff. Defendant objects to the following instruction given: "That if you find from the evidence that the plaintiff was injured by one or more of defendant's cars, at or near a street crossing, at the time of the passing of another car, it is for the jury to determine from all the evidence, taking into consideration all of the circumstances of the case, whether it was negligence for the defendant motorman operating the car which did the injury to pass such other car at that place and at the time at which you find from the evidence he did that." As we have seen, the question of negligence in one car passing another at a street crossing is one of fact, in the light of all the evidence in the case.

2. The railway company was negligent in the operation of the car. The controller handle was defective and the car could not be stopped with the same facility as if the appliance had been sound. But the defendant alleges contributory negligence upon the part of the infant plaintiff,—that plaintiff placed himself in a dangerous position contributing to his injury. The question of the contributory negligence of plaintiff is one of fact, and for the jury, unless the undisputed facts are so clear that all reasonable inferences point to one conclusion. It was observed in Consolidated Traction Co. v. Scott, 58 N. J. L. 682, 33 L. R. A. 122, 34 Atl. 1094, which case, in its facts, is somewhat similar to the one at bar: "There is another element to be considered as affecting juridical action upon the question of contributory negligence in this case, and one that I think clearly makes it a question for the jury alone, and that is the fact that the plaintiff's intestate was a boy of tender years. He was described as a bright boy, but he was so young that naturally his powers of reason and judgment could be but partially developed. He had not passed far beyond the age of seven years. . . . Where there is a question whether the child is of sufficient age and discretion to be capable of some care for his own safety the question of his capacity and its degree is for the jury. . . . And when a child has reached the age of discretion and is considered sui juris as a matter of law, the degree of care and caution required of him will be no higher than such as is usually exercised by persons of similar age, judgment, and experience; and whether that degree of care and caution has been exercised by the child in a given case is usually, if not always, a question of fact for the jury. 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 46, and cases cited." It was said in Redford v. Spokane Street R. Co. 15 Wash. 419, 48 Pac. 650, that when the defendant's negligence is the proximate cause of the injury, while that of the plaintiff is only a remote cause or a mere condition of it, the defendant is still liable. In Mitchell v. Tacoma R. & Motor Co. 9 Wash. 120, 37 Pac. 341, the following instruction of the superior court was approved: "In determining whether the plaintiff or defendant was guilty of negligence, if either of them was, you should take into consideration the age and intelligence of the plaintiff. The law does not require the same degree of caution from a child of tender years as would under like circumstances be required of an adult, but the degree of caution required is to be determined by the maturity and capacity of the child. So that what you might consider under the same or similar circumstances would be negligence on the part of a grown person would not necessarily be so considered by you in case of a child of tender years." It was also ruled in that case that there was sufficient evidence to refuse a nonsuit when the facts shown were that the gripman did not keep such a lookout as the circumstances demanded, nor give any warning of approach, and that after discovering the child on the track the car might have been stopped sooner if the brakes had been in proper condition; and it was observed: "The mere circumstance that the car ran an unusual distance before it was stopped was some evidence either of improper management or that it was out of repair, or that the brakes were defective." No negligence on the part of the parents was shown. The real question here arises upon the motion to instruct for the defendant upon the ground of contributory negligence by the infant plaintiff; and, conceding there was want of ordinary care in the plaintiff preceding the collision, did it contribute to the injury, or was it a mere condition before the accident? We conclude that the important inquiry determinative of this controversy is, Was the negligence of the defendant the proximate cause of the injury? The facts shown by the plaintiff have been given and do all the inferences arising from them show to all reasonable minds that want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff contributed to his injury? We have seen that it was not negligence per se for plaintiff to pass from behind the west-bound car for the purpose of crossing the south track. In the case of Thompson v. Salt Lake Rapid Transit Co. 16 Utah, 281, 40 L. R. A. 172, 52 Pac. 92, the facts are very similar to those in the case under consideration. There the defendant sent out a defective street car, and maintained that the plaintiff was negligent in crossing the track in front of the car and that in such case it was the duty of the defendant, after discovering the dangerous situation of the plaintiff, caused by his own negligence, only to exercise all reasonable care and diligence at his command at the time of the injury, and that when the motorman did all he could to stop the car, although its brakes were defective, the defendant could not be held liable. Of this the court observed: "The result of such a doctrine would be that under such circumstances, when the defendant discovered negligence in a plaintiff, it could legally excuse the exercise of its own want of reasonable care by showing that its appliances and brakes were in such a wretched condition at the time, on account of its previous and continued negligence, that it was incapacitated from preventing the injury complained of at the time by the use of reasonable care. . . . If such rules were applicable to contributory negligence, his [plaintiff's] safety in crossing a street where street cars were operated, with his right to recover damages in case of negligence, would largely depend upon the option of the company to keep its appliances in good repair." The question of contributory negligence, under all the circumstances in the case, was, we think, properly submitted to the jury, and its verdict must be conclusive.

of the respondent constituted contributory negligence as a matter of law, and that, if there had been no fault on the part of the appellant which was the proximate cause of the injury, the respondent could not recover. But whatever the fault of the appellant may be termed,—whether "comparative negligence" or "wilful negligence,"—companies employing dangerous agencies like electricity must be held to the highest degree of care, not only in operating their cars, but in what is of even more importance, viz., in furnishing their servants with suitable equipment for properly operating the cars; for, without a compliance with this first and most important requisite, the skill and care of the operators would be of little avail. In this case, if the controller had been in perfect order, and the motorman had not been driven to the necessity of finally resorting to the over switch to throw off the electricity, thereby losing precious time, the injury would probably have been averted. The imperfect condition of the controller handle was known to the company, and the operation of the car with this glaring defect in an appliance so important, and upon which the safety of the traveling public so largely depends, placed the company in the attitude of operating its car in wilful disregard of the rights of the traveling public; and such acts should be held to be wilful negligence, in their application to the party injured.

(24 Wash. 493.)

A municipal corporation owning land on a navigable lake and its non-navigable outlet cannot appropriate the waters of the lake for a municipal water supply, even under permission of the state, to the injury of a riparian owner whose rights vested before the adoption of the state Constitution, which asserted ownership in the state of the beds of all navigable lakes, but provided that it should not deprive any person from asserting his claim to vested rights.

White, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was originally instituted in the district court of the territory of Washington on the 8th day of August, 1889, by the Fairhaven Land Company, as plaintiff, against the Bellingham Bay Water Company, as defendant. The object of the action was to restrain and enjoin the Bellingham Bay Water Company, as a private corporation engaged in the business of supplying the inhabitants of the town of Whatcom with water for general domestic and municipal use, from diverting the waters of Whatcom creek from its natural bed for that purpose. Whatcom creek is the only outlet of Lake Whatcom, and flows from said lake, which is situated about 3 miles to the southeastward of its outlet, in a fixed and well-defined channel, and has a fall from the lake of 318 feet, and is not in any sense a navigable stream. Lake Whatcom is the source of Whatcom creek, and is a large navigable, fresh-water lake, with an area of about 7½ miles, or about 5,000 acres, and is a meandered lake. Whatcom creek empties into Bellingham bay, a part of Puget sound. In the descent of the creek to Bellingham bay there is a series of falls, the last of which is about 25 feet in height, and the bottom of which is on a level with the tidal waters of Bellingham bay. This last waterfall is immediately below a mill-dam used by the plaintiff in propelling a sawmill. There is a constant flow of water through the channel of the creek, which varies with the seasons. The capacity of the mill is about 75,000 feet of lumber per day. The natural flowage of the creek, undiminished by any diversion, is insufficient during the dry season of each year to operate the mill all the time. During the rainy season the flow of water through the creek aggregates about 100,000,000 of gallons per day, and during the dry season the average flowage is from 5,000,000 to 8,000,000 gallons per day. To operate the sawmill and the water wheels connected therewith, about 2,500,000 gallons per hour is required. In 1853 one Russell V. Peabody entered, under what is known as the "Donation Act," a part of the N. W. ¼ of the S. W. ¼ of section 30, township 38 N., of range 3 E. The plaintiff's mill is situated on a tract of land at the mouth of Whatcom creek, which is a part of the Peabody donation claim. The plaintiff is the owner of the lands at the mouth of the creek, and is the lowest riparian owner thereon, and its lands include the bed of the creek for a distance of about ½ mile upward from where the creek empties into Bellingham bay. In the year 1854 Peabody and others associated with him erected on the tract now owned by the plaintiff a sawmill, and operated it by water power from Whatcom creek until 1874, when the mill was burned down. In 1882 or 1883 the mill, owned by the plaintiff at the time this action was commenced, was built on plaintiff's land about 50 yards below the old mill site; the office of the new mill being about where the old mill stood. By means of conveyances from the Peabody heirs and Peabody's associates and their grantees on the 8th day of May, 1889, the plaintiff became the owner of said mill and mill site, and has been the owner ever since. The mill built in 1882 is also propelled by water from Whatcom creek. Whatcom creek flows through the Peabody donation claim and said mill tract. Subsequent to the institution of this action the Bellingham Bay Water Company, for the purpose of supplying the people of New Whatcom with water for domestic and municipal purposes, laid its water pipes and mains upon the streets of Whatcom, and ran its mains up said Whatcom creek to a point about ½ mile from Lake Whatcom, and above the mill and lands of the plaintiff, and there connected its intake pipes and mains with the channel of said creek, and diverted therefrom the water supply for said city of New Whatcom. The present population of New Whatcom is about 7,000, and it is one of the growing and important cities of Puget sound. In 1893, and at the time the Bellingham Bay Water Company's intake pipes were connected with and were in the channel of Whatcom creek, the city of New Whatcom purchased said water system from said water company; and thereafter the city of New Whatcom extended the water mains from where the intake pipes were located in said creek to and within Lake Whatcom proper, and located the intake pipes, which were 24 inches in diameter, about ¼ of a mile from the outlet of the lake, the head of Whatcom creek, placing such intake pipes about 6 feet below the bed of the creek at its source in the lake, and ever since has maintained said water system, and since such extension of the mains the water supply of New Whatcom has been taken directly from Lake Whatcom, and from no other source whatever. Said lake is the only practical source of water supply for the city of New Whatcom, and each year the necessities of the public and of the inhabitants of the city for supply of water are becoming more important and exacting. The city of New Whatcom has also entered into various contracts and leases with various of its citizens and inhabitants, by which it agreed to furnish and is furnishing such parties, through its water mains, water from Lake Whatcom for power purposes, to enable such parties to operate mills, printing presses, feed mills, electric-light plants, and various other machinery, and to supply docks, steamers, coal bunkers, etc. The water is also used by the city in operating public fountains and for public buildings, and in flushing sewers, etc. After New Whatcom purchased said system an amended complaint was filed in this action, and the city of New Whatcom was made a party defendant, and the action was discontinued against the Bellingham Bay Water Company, and the city of New Whatcom was substituted for the Bellingham Bay Water Company as the sole defendant. Neither the Bellingham Bay Water Company nor the city of New Whatcom at any time instituted any action to condemn, nor have they at any time condemned, plaintiff's property, nor have they taken any action to secure the right to divert the waters of said Whatcom creek or of said Lake Whatcom for public or private use or for any other purpose, nor have they in any manner settled or attempted to settle or adjust any damages that plaintiff has or may suffer by reason of the diversion of said water. The Bellingham Bay Water Company, by lease or otherwise, was the riparian owner of the bed of said creek near the source thereof above the lands and mill site of the plaintiff at the time it put in its water system, and continued so up to the date of the sale of its system to New Whatcom, and the city of New Whatcom succeeded to whatever rights the water company had as such riparian owner; and the water company was a riparian owner on said creek above plaintiff prior to the date of the plaintiff's purchase of the mill and mill tract, and that fact was known to the plaintiff when it purchased. The city of New Whatcom has become the successor of the water company in supplying its inhabitants with water, and the value and use of the water system depend almost wholly upon a source of supply from said lake. If the supply was shut off the entire plant would be rendered valueless, and the people of the city would be greatly injured, and the public health might be endangered. The city of New Whatcom is situated on both sides of the creek, the full length of the creek from its source, taking in a part of Lake Whatcom and to its outlet. Streets and alleys are located and run across, parallel to, and upon the banks and bed of the creek; and the city of New Whatcom is the owner of property on the shores of the lake and in the bed of the creek at its source, and is a riparian owner on the lake and creek. By constructing a dam at the head of the creek at the foot of the lake the surplus water of the lake during the winter or wet seasons can be stored or retained until the dry weather approaches, and can be used during the summer to keep up and maintain the full natural flowage of the creek during the entire season. It is manifest from the evidence and findings in the case that by reason of the intake pipes of the water system being laid in Lake Whatcom, and the water drawn off thereby, the natural flowage of Whatcom creek is greatly diminished, and that by reason thereof there is not sufficient water at certain seasons of the year to operate the plaintiff's mill as the plaintiff might operate it but for the diversion of the water through the intake pipes of the defendant. The court below held that the diversion of any of the waters from Lake Whatcom, under the water system of the defendant, for the purpose of supplying water and power to the various light plants, wood yards, printing offices, etc., was in violation of the rights of the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff being the lowest riparian owner on the creek, and having appropriated the flowage thereof for mill purposes long prior to the attempted diversion of any of the waters of said creek, or of Lake Whatcom, the source of said creek, by the defendant or the water company, such diversion by the defendant was in violation of the rights of the plaintiff; and the court gave to the plaintiff a perpetual injunction against the city of New Whatcom, enjoining and restraining it from diverting any of the waters of said creek, or the waters of said lake, the source of said creek, for any purpose whatever, until such time as the said city should compensate the plaintiff for any damages accruing to it by reason of such diversion. From this decree the city appeals.

The principal contention of the appellant is that the state, under article 17, § 1, of 54 L. R. A.

the Constitution, is the sole and absolute owner of the bed, the shore to high-water mark, and the waters of Lake Whatcom; that the state can use or divert, or authorize the use or diversion of, the waters in the lake for any public purpose; that to supply the inhabitants of a city with water is a public purpose, and is a paramount necessity superior to every other use; that the state has authorized such use, and under such authorization the appellant is using the waters of the lake; and that the respondent has no interest in the waters of the lake.

The title to lands under tide waters in the sea, arms, and inlets thereof, and in tidal rivers, within the realm of England, was by the common law deemed to be vested in the King, as a public trust, to subserve and protect the public right to use them as a common highway for commerce, trade, and intercourse. The King, by virtue of his proprietary interest, could grant the soil so that it should become private property; but his grant was subject to the paramount right of the public use of navigable waters, which he could neither destroy nor abridge. In every such grant there was an implied reservation of the public right. Upon the American Revolution the title and dominion of the tide waters, and of the lands under them, vested in the several states of the Union within their respective borders, subject to the rights surrendered by the Constitution to the United States. The new states admitted into the Union since the adoption of the Constitution have the same rights as the original states in the tide waters, and in the lands under them, within their respective jurisdictions. Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 1, 38 L. ed. 331, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 548; Sage v. New York, 154 N. Y. 61, 38 L. R. A. 606, 47 N. E. 1096. Fresh-water lakes in England are private property, and the Crown and public possessed no such rights in fresh-water lakes as they possessed in tide waters. In navigable fresh-water rivers above the flow of the tide the bed of the river belonged to the owners of the adjacent soil to the middle of the stream. In this country the doctrine of private ownership has been generally recognized as the rule of the common law, but it has been held to be inapplicable to the condition of many of those states in which the inland rivers and lakes are large. The provision of article 17, § 1, of the Constitution was evidently for the purpose of establishing the right of the state to the beds of all navigable waters in the state, whether lakes or rivers, or fresh or salt, to the same extent the Crown had in England in the sea, and in the arms and inlets thereof, and in the tidal rivers, and to eliminate the distinctions existing under the rule of the common law in this respect. Whatever rights the respondent possesses were acquired and became vested before the adoption of our state Constitution. This court has decided that these rights are to be determined by the rule of the common law, so far as not repugnant to or inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, or the organic act or laws of Washington territory, or incompatible with the institutions and conditions of society in this state, and that the riparian owner is to be protected in the use and enjoyment of the water naturally flowing by or over his land, and, for the purpose of protecting the rights of a grantee of the government,—such as Russell V. Peabody and his grantees are in this case,—his title relates back to the first act necessary on his part in the proceedings to acquire title. Benton v. Johnson, 17 Wash. 277, 39 L. R. A. 107, 49 Pac. 495. Section 16, art. 1, of the Constitution expressly provides that “no private property shall be taken or damaged for public or private use without just compensation having been first made, or paid into court for the owner.” Section 1, art. 17, of the Constitution, under which the appellant claims that the state is the sole and absolute owner of the bed, the shore to high-water mark, and the waters of Lake Whatcom, and can dispose of such waters as it sees fit, expressly protects all persons in asserting their claims to vested rights. That section reads as follows: “The state of Washington asserts its ownership to the beds and shores of all navigable waters in the state up to and including the line of ordinary high tide in waters where the tide ebbs and flows, and up to and including the line of ordinary high water within the banks of all navigable rivers and lakes; provided, that this section shall not be construed so as to debar any person from asserting his claim to vested rights in the courts of the state.” Though this section has the effect, as has been held by this court in Eisenbach v. Hatfield, 2 Wash. 236, 12 L. R. A. 632, 26 Pac. 539, and Harbor Line Comrs. v. State ex rel. Yeaser, 2 Wash. 530, 27 Pac. 550, of vesting in the state the entire and exclusive ownership of the beds and shores of all navigable waters, it should not be construed as affecting the rights of riparian proprietors upon non-navigable water-courses, though their source is in navigable waters. The use of the water in such non-navigable streams is not inconsistent with the retention of the fee in the bed of navigable waters in the state. Cocheco Mfg. Co. v. Strafford, 51 N. H. 455. The provisions of § 16, art. 1, of the Constitution protect private property from confiscation for a public use; and the proviso to article 17, § 1, clearly indicates that so far as rights had become vested, notwithstanding the other provisions of the section the owner thereof should have the right to assert them in the courts; and, if this language means anything, it is that those rights should be protected and safeguarded by the courts. In Crook v. Hewitt, 4 Wash. 749, 31 Pac. 28, this court quotes with approval from Gould, Waters, 2d ed. p. 396: “The right to the use of the water in its natural flow is not a mere easement or appurtenance, but is inseparably annexed to the soil itself.” In Bigney v. Tacoma Light & Water Co. 9 Wash. 576, 26 L. R. A. 425, 38 Pac. 147, 54 L. R. A.

it is said: “The right to the use of water flowing over land is identified with the realty, and is a real and corporeal hereditament. . . . And this right is a substantial one, and may be the subject of sale or lease like the land itself.” In the two cases cited it is held that every riparian proprietor, in the absence of a grant, license, or prescription limiting his right, is entitled to have the stream which passes over or adjacent to his land flow as it is wont by nature, affected only in quantity or quality by the consequence of a reasonable use thereof by other proprietors, and that the riparian proprietor’s right to the flow of the water is inseparably annexed to the soil, and passes with it, as a part and parcel of it; that a riparian proprietor may divert the water from the stream as it passes through his own land, without license from the proprietors above him, if he does not obstruct the water from flowing as freely as it was wont, and without license from the lower proprietors, if he restores the water to its natural channel before it enters their land, and does not materially diminish its flow. The constitutional provision relied upon by the appellant does not in any way affect the rights of the respondent in the flowage of Whatcom creek as they existed in 1889, before the adoption of the Constitution, when this action was instituted. The mere fact that the state owns the bed of Lake Whatcom has little, if any, bearing on the diversion of the waters so that they cease to flow in Whatcom creek; for, as we have said, the flow of the water in the creek is not inconsistent with the retention by the state of the fee in the bed of the lake. The right of the state over the waters of Lake Whatcom is such as pertains to sovereignty alone. That is the right to use, regulate, and control these waters as a common highway for commerce, trade, and intercourse, and to grant the soil in the bed of the lake so that it might become private property, subject to the paramount right of public use for navigation. In short, that the rights of the state in the navigable waters thereof are the same rights as pertained to the sovereign at common law in the sea, its bays, arms, and inlets. But conceding that by article 17, § 1, of the Constitution absolute ownership is now in the state, so that the state can dispose of the waters as well as the soil, the vested rights of the respondent, notwithstanding, are preserved to it. That is the right to the use of the water in its natural flow as it existed before the adoption of the Constitution, when the United States granted to Russell V. Peabody, under the donation act, the land over which Whatcom creek flows, of which the lands of the respondent are a part. The Constitution having reserved to the respondent its vested rights, the legislature, except under the power of eminent domain, upon making compensation, could not divest it of that right, either directly or indirectly, for a public or private use. Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984. As was said by Justice Miller in the case last cited:

"This riparian right is property and is valuable, and, though it must be enjoyed in due subjection to the rights of the public, it cannot be arbitrarily or capriciously destroyed or impaired. It is a right of which, when once vested, the owner can only be deprived in accordance with established law, and, if necessary that it be taken for the public good, upon due compensation." As was said by the Missouri court of appeals in Meyers v. St. Louis, 8 Mo. App. 266: "When it is settled that riparian rights are property,—and of this there seems to be no doubt,—the question as to the right to take them without compensation is at an end." In Mohr v. Gault, 10 Wis. 513, 78 Am. Dec. 687,—a case where one undertook to cut a new channel so as to carry off the waters of a small lake by another way than through the usual outlet, on which the complainant's mill was situated,—it was held that the owners along the natural outlet had a legal right to the natural and usual flow of the water of the lake through such outlet.

The legislature of the state of New York had given a grant to the city of Rochester authorizing it to enter upon, control, and use the waters of Hemlock and Canadice lakes for the purpose of procuring a water supply for said city. These were large, fresh-water, navigable lakes, connected by a small stream; and Honeoye creek was their outlet, upon which was located Smith's water mills. Under legislative authority the city of Rochester proceeded to extract and carry away a part of the waters of these lakes to the detriment of Smith. The city was enjoined, and the court of appeals held that the right to the usufructuary enjoyment of the undiminished and undisturbed flow which a riparian owner possesses in the case of non-navigable streams applies to fresh-water, navigable lakes, save that the public has an easement in such waters for the purposes of travel, as on a public highway, which easement, as it pertains to the sovereignty of the state, is inalienable, and gives to the state the right to use, regulate, and control the waters for the purposes of navigation; and the right to divert the waters for other purposes than navigation. although public in their nature, can only be acquired under and by virtue of the sovereign right, or eminent domain, and upon making just compensation. Smith v. Rochester, 92 N. Y. 463, 44 Am. Rep. 393. Two lakes were the reservoirs from which a creek was fed. One sought to appropriate the waters of the lakes in such a manner that the quantity of the water flowing down the creek would be interfered with. Plaintiffs were riparian owners and appropriators of the creek. The supreme court of California says: "If the tapping of these lakes by appellants reduces the amount of water to which plaintiffs are entitled, or shortens the period of time in which they might otherwise secure water from the creek, then the acts of appellants, clearly, are a trespass upon plaintiffs' rights,—exactly the same kind of trespass 54 L. R. A.

as though the creek was tapped, and that amount of water directly taken therefrom, without any molestation of the lakes." Baxter v. Gilbert, 125 Cal. 580, 58 Pac. 129, 374. Plaintiff was the owner of certain mills built on his own land, on the banks of the Cottonwood river. The mills were propelled by water power obtained by means of a dam across the river. The city of Emporia constructed a system of waterworks for the purpose of supplying the citizens with water for domestic use, for extinguishing fires, and for manufacturing purposes. It purchased a tract of land on the banks of the pond above the plaintiff's dam, dug a well 25 feet in diameter and 26 feet in depth on its own land, and from 70 to 100 feet from the bank of the pond. This well drew its supply of water from the pond by percolation through a bed of gravel at the bottom of the well. It sank one pipe into the well, and another it extended directly into the pond; the latter to be used in case of fire. By means of engines and pumps it supplied the citizens from the well with water needed for ordinary purposes. The supply of water in the river at certain seasons of the year was inadequate for running the mills, and the plaintiff was forced to suspend work and allow his mills to stand idle. Justice Brewer, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court of Kansas on this state of facts said: "The amount of water now used by the city, and its present effect upon the plaintiff's business, do not determine the question of right or remedy. The continuance of the waterworks, as well as the growth of the city, will increase the demand; and, if the present abstraction can be sustained, there is no legal principle upon which the future and larger abstraction can be restrained. Now, that the flow of water in the natural channel of a surface stream is a property right of the riparian owner is unquestioned and familiar law. Shamleffer v. Council Grove Peerless Mill Co. 18 Kan. 24. If an individual should by digging a new channel a few hundred feet above Soden's dam, attempt to divert the flow of the stream, beyond doubt he would be restrained. And this restraint would be granted, not because of the mere fact of digging a channel, but because thereby the natural flow of the stream was prevented; not because of the manner, but because of the fact, of the diversion. The restraint would be granted as readily if the abstraction was by pipes and pumps as if by channel and a change of current. The principle is this: That whatever of benefit, whether of power or otherwise, comes from the flow of water in the channel of a natural stream, is a matter of property, and belongs to the riparian owner, and is protected in law just as fully as the land which he owns. It cannot be taken for private use except by his consent, and for public use only upon due compensation. With these general and conceded principles, let us now inquire as to the validity of the grounds upon which the action of the city is sought to be justified. The fact is obvious that by means of the pipe running into the pond there will be, in case of fire, a direct abstraction of water, and the fact is found that by means of the well there is an indirect abstraction. The flow of water is, as heretofore stated, thus interfered with, and the power diminished. It is in evidence that while at certain seasons of the year the water supply is more than enough for all of plaintiff's present uses, and that during such seasons the consumption of water in the city would work no present injury, yet at other seasons the supply is insufficient, and some or all of his mills are compelled to stop running. Hence, naturally any subtraction of the water would tend to increase the time during which his mills must be idle, and therefore work present and positive injury,—an injury increasing with the increasing consumption by the city. Further, if plaintiff is entitled to this water power at all, he is entitled to all of it, and may increase the number of mills, or amount of machinery propelled by it, until his uses shall wholly exhaust it. So that matters of amount really fade out of sight, and the question is one of right and title." Emporia v. Soden, 25 Kan. 588, 37 Am. Rep. 265. In the same case the city sought to justify the taking of the water as a riparian owner owning the lands above the plaintiffs. On this point Justice Brewer says: "While the undiminished flow of the stream is conceded to be the right of every riparian owner, yet this right has always been limited to this extent; that each riparian owner may, without subjecting himself to liability to any lower riparian owner, use of the water whatever is needed for his own domestic purposes and the watering of his stock. The city is a riparian owner, and, whether it uses little or much, it is simply taking for domestic purposes. Each individual citizen of Emporia may buy land on the banks of the river, and then take for domestic uses whatever amount of water he needs. What the individual separately may do, the city, representing all the individuals, has done. Does the manner in which the result was accomplished make any difference in the right? This argument is plausible, but not sound. A city cannot be considered a riparian owner, within the scope of the exception named. The amount of water which an individual living on the banks of a stream will use for domestic purposes is comparatively trifling. Such use may be tolerated upon the principle, De minimis non curat lex. It is a use which must always be anticipated, and may reasonably be considered as one of the benefits of the ownership of the banks of a natural stream. Everyone proposing to utilize the power of running water should reasonably expect that the stream is chargeable with such a slight burden. It is only a fair equalization of rights. But the taking of water for the supply of a populous and growing city stands upon an entirely different basis. No man can foresee this; and, if it were tolerated, no one would dare to expend money in utilizing this power, for fear of its being soon taken from him without compensation, and with total loss to his investment. The city, as a corporation, may own land on the banks, and thus in one sense be a riparian owner. But this does not make each citizen a riparian owner. And the corporation is not taking the water for its own domestic purposes. It is not an individual. It has no natural wants. It is not taking for its own use, but to supply a multitude of individuals. It takes to sell. Again, the statute under which the city is acting (Comp. Laws 1879, p. 997, § 1) authorizes the taking of water "for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants of such cities with water for domestic use, the extinguishment of fires, and for manufacturing and other purposes." It would be strange if the city could destroy plaintiff's water power without compensation, and then sell it to other manufacturers, and thus build up rival establishments." Emporia v. Soden, 25 Kan. 588, 37 Am. Rep. 265. See also Stein v. Burden, 24 Ala. 130, 60 Am. Dec. 453; Garwood v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 83 N. Y. 400, 38 Am. Rep. 452.

It is not disputed in this case that the effect of the appellant's intake pipes, as laid into the lake, is simply to afford an additional channel for the outflow of the lake, and that respondent's mill is deprived of the amount of water by the city actually diverted. Now, no one can do indirectly what the law will not permit him to do directly. On this point, in the case of Emporia v. Soden, 25 Kan. 588, 37 Am. Rep. 265, the court says: "It is also a general proposition that a man may not do indirectly what he may not do directly. Unquestionably, a party may not run pipes into plaintiff's mill pond, or dig a channel to it, and thus divert the water. May he accomplish the same result by digging a well upon the very banks, and so near thereto that the water oozes out from the pond into the well, and be beyond the reach of law, so long as he keeps a wall of earth between the well and the pond? If this were recognized as law, protection to the owners of water power would rest on slender foundations. Often the banks of a stream are composed of very porous soil, or it may be there is, as in this case, a bed of gravel through which the water runs as through a sieve. Is the owner of the pond, then, at the mercy of anyone who, avoiding the more direct and public method of pipe or channel, resorts to the equally effective means of adjacent wells? And if a well on the very bank would be restrained, may the same result be accomplished by digging one a few feet off? It would seem as though but one answer could, in justice, be given,—that the owner of an established power is entitled to protection against any subtraction therefrom, whether sought to be accomplished by direct or indirect methods."

The intake pipes of the appellant, 24 inches in diameter, placed 6 feet below the bed of Whatcom creek, a quarter of a mile from the outlet of the lake, through which the appellant diverts the water that would otherwise flow down the bed of the creek, certainly cause an indirect diversion of the water from the bed of the creek to the extent of the capacity of the pipe; and this diversion is just as much a violation of the rights of the respondent as if the pipe was in the bed of the creek above the respondent's mill, where it was originally placed by the water company.

The Great Pond Cases from Massachusetts and Maine have no bearing upon this case; for, as the appellant says, the colonial ordinances of Massachusetts changed the common law as to great ponds in both those states. The cases from New York cited by appellant, on the Mohawk and Hudson rivers, grew out of the civil law prevailing in the Netherlands, under which titles were granted to the original settlers. Smith v. Rochester, 92 N. Y. 482, 44 Am. Rep. 393. The only case that the appellant has cited bearing upon the question here involved, and contrary to the authorities we have cited, and the views we have expressed, is from Minnesota,—the case of Minneapolis Mill Co. v. St. Paul Water Comrs. 56 Minn. 485, 58 N. W. 33. In that case the appellants were a corporation created by acts of the territorial legislature, and authorized to build and maintain dams in the Mississippi river, at the falls of St. Anthony, for the development of water power, and for the use and sale of such power. Dams were erected and maintained under this authority forming such power. After this the legislature authorized the city of St. Paul to purchase, and there was purchased, the property and franchises of a private corporation theretofore engaged in supplying said city with water. Under the provisions of law the city extended this system, and established a pumping station at Lake Baldwin, a body of water with an area less than a mile square, and by means of its pumps forced water through conduits to the city for public use. The outlet of this lake is Rice creek, and this creek empties into the Mississippi river a few miles above the dams built and maintained by appellants. The claim was that the result of this diversion was to greatly diminish the volume which came to the dam, and to materially affect and reduce the water power. The supreme court of Minnesota, in rendering their opinion, say: "The plaintiffs are riparian owners on a navigable or public stream, and their rights as such owners are subordinate to public uses of the water in the stream and their rights under their charters are, equally with their rights as riparian owners, subordinate to these public uses. There can be no doubt but that the public, through their representatives, have the right to apply these waters to such public uses without providing for or making compensation to riparian owners. The navigation of the stream is not the only public use to which these public waters may be thus applied. The right to draw from them and supply water for the ordinary use of cities in their vicinity is such a public use, and has always been so recognized. At the present time it is one of the most important public rights, and is daily growing in importance as population increases. . . . Thus taking water from navigable streams or lakes for such ordinary public uses, the power of the state is not limited or controlled by the rules which obtain between riparian owners as to the diversion from and its return to its natural channels. Once conceding that the taking is for a public use, and the above proposition naturally follows." Not an authority is cited by that court to sustain these views. This case was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. That court held that the property rights of the plaintiff in error as riparian owners were to be measured by the rules and decisions of the state courts of Minnesota, and that none of the decisions of the state courts of Minnesota were inconsistent with the decision of the court in the case under review, and for that reason the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the judgment. St. Anthony Falls Water Power Co. v. St. Paul Water Comrs. 168 U. S. 349, 42 L. ed. 497, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 157. That case has little, if any, bearing on the one under consideration; for the supreme court of this state, in cases heretofore cited, has repeatedly held the rule to be otherwise than that laid down by the supreme court of Minnesota. It may be conceded that at the time this action was tried and judgment was entered, the city of New Whatcom, under the law approved March 14, 1899 (Seas. Laws 1899, p. 250), authorizing municipal ownership of certain public utilities, had the right to take and appropriate from Lake Whatcom an ample supply of water for all uses and purposes, public and private, and that it had the right to build dams or other works across the outlet of any lake or watercourse for the purpose of storing and retaining water therein up to and above high-water mark; provided, that such dam did not obstruct, impede, or interfere with navigation or other public use; and provided, further, that, if any private property should be necessary for such purposes, the same was to be condemned or purchased. In this case, however, no steps have been taken to condemn or purchase the property of the respondent in the flow of Whatcom creek, which the appellant has appropriated, and this is one of the very things the city was required to do when exercising the powers conferred on it by the act of 1889, Mr. Loggie, a lessee of the respondent's mill, with the permission of the appellant, but without permission or direction from the respondent, in 1899 (the year of the trial of this case) built a temporary dam at the outlet of the lake for the purpose of storing the water for use during the dry season. There is testimony tending to show that by means of this dam a sufficient quantity of water was stored in the lake for the use of the appellant, and also the respondent's mill, during the dry season of that year. We are at a loss to know why this fact is urged against the correctness of the trial court's decree. The city of New Whatcom is a large and growing city, and it may need, under its water system, all of the outflow waters of Lake Whatcom both summer and winter. The question involved in this action is the right of the city to divert a part or all of these waters without compensating the respondent, the owner of this outflow at the mouth of the natural outlet.

We hold that the judgment and decree of the court below was correct, and is fully sustained by reason and the decisions of this and almost all other courts, and for that reason the judgment must be affirmed, subject to the modifications hereinafter indicated.

While it is no part of the office of the court to consider the ways and means by which the appellant may comply with the decree entered against it, yet, in this case, as a numerous population will be suddenly deprived of that which is essential to their health and existence if the decree is at once enforced, we modify the decree of the court below as follows: The said appellant shall have sixty days from the filing of this opinion to purchase from or otherwise arrange with the respondent for the use of said flowage, or, if such purchase or arrangement cannot be made, to commence proceedings in the superior court to condemn the property and rights of the respondent in Whatcom creek as indicated in this opinion. If condemnation proceedings are instituted within said time, then the injunction granted by the decree of the court below shall be stayed until the final determination of such condemnation proceedings; provided, such proceedings are prosecuted by the appellant with due diligence. The respondent to recover its costs in the court below and on this appeal.

Fullerton and Anders, JJ., concur. Reavis, Ch. J., concurs on the ground that respondent made the first appropriation and use for a beneficial purpose.

Dunbar, J.:

I concur in the affirmance of the judgment, but not in what is said in relation to the modification. The appellant can pursue its legal remedies, if it has any, like any other litigant; and the respondent is as much entitled to its legal remedy, unqualified by prescribed conditions, as though its adversary were an individual.

(24 Wash. 636.)

1. Error in continuing a temporary injunction until final hearing cannot be corrected on appeal from the final judgment, where the trial court itself dissolved the injunction at the final hearing.
2. A stream 100 feet wide and 3 feet deep, which, during annually recurring freshets for a period of twenty-five years, has been profitably used for floating logs to market, is a public highway for that purpose.
3. The provision of the Constitution reserving to the state the title to the beds of the navigable waters of the state does not apply to streams which are valuable only for floating logs to market during periods of annual freshets.
4. Neither an individual desiring to use a stream for floating logs to market, nor a corporation formed to take advantage of a statute authorizing the improvement of floatable streams, can interfere with the soil in the stream without the consent of the abutting owner or operation of law with due compensation made.
5. One attempting to float logs down a stream is liable to the abutting owner for injuries to his land by jams caused by the careless manner of driving the logs.

(April 18, 1901.)

CROSS-APPEALS by plaintiffs and defendant Thomas Dorris from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wahkiakum County in a suit to enjoin defendants from interfering with plaintiffs' breaking a log jam upon defendants' property; defendant Thomas appealing from so much as awarded a temporary injunction; and plaintiffs appealing from so much as awarded damages to defendants for the injury done to their land by the jam. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. Bruce Polwarth and George Noland, for appellants Watkins et al.:

The modification of the common law has been to extend, by statutory enactment, public waterways so as to include those streams capable of being used, profitably by the public, in their natural condition, to float logs to market. Where these statutes have provided for compensation to riparian proprietors, they have generally been sustained by the courts as a proper exercise of the power of eminent domain. Where there has been no provision made for compensation for the use of such streams, they have generally been condemned by the courts as unconstitutional for taking private property for public use without compensation.

PER CURIAM:

This action was instituted by appellants, who compose a partnership doing a logging business under the firm name of the Elochoman Logging Company, in the county of Wahkiakum, state of Washington. Appellants are the owners of certain timber lands situate upon and adjacent to the stream named and designated as the "Elochoman River," or "Elochoman Creek," and have for some time been engaged in cutting and removing from said premises the merchantable spruce and fir timber thereon, and by means of said stream have been transporting the saw logs cut from said timber to tide water, for the purpose of booming and rafting the same there for transportation to the market. The action was brought against Thomas Dorris and William Dorris, respondents here; and said Thomas Dorris is also an appellant. Said Thomas Dorris is the owner of certain other lands lying upon both sides of said stream and below the lands of appellant, the Elochoman Logging Company. During the month of November, 1897, the said logging company, having theretofore placed about 1,500 logs in said stream, undertook to run the same down the stream where it passes through the lands of said Thomas Dorris. At a point in said stream where it passes through the lands of said Thomas Dorris is a large rock, so situated and imbedded that, when said appellants' logs were carried down by a freshet then occurring, their passage was obstructed by said rock, a jam was formed, and the waters of the stream were thereby backed and caused to overflow the lands of said Thomas Dorris. The said appellants then sought to break said jam, and alleged in their complaint that the only way of approaching thereto was from the banks of said stream, over the lands of the respondents Dorris, and that said respondents prevented the appellants from making such approach and from entering upon said lands for said purpose, and had threatened appellants with personal violence if they should undertake to go upon said lands for said purpose. They further alleged that the force of the water at said point was insufficient to break said jam, and that it could only be done by men aided by steam or horse power operated upon the banks of said stream, on the lands of the said respondents. They also alleged that the value of the logs held by said jam was $8,000, and that they had been damaged in the sum of $2,000 by the conduct of the Dorries in preventing them from going upon said lands to break said jam, and prayed judgment for said sum, and also prayed for a temporary restraining order preventing the respondents from in any manner interfering with the appellants' entering upon the banks of said stream for the purpose of breaking said jam, and also preventing them from interfering with the removal of the rocks from the bed of the stream which were obstructions to the passage of said logs. Upon the showing made, the court granted the temporary restraining order, without notice, and fixed a date in the order when respondents should, after notice, show cause why a temporary injunction should not issue pending the final hearing of the cause. A hearing was had at said time, and the court continued the temporary injunction until the final hearing of the cause. Assignments of error are urged by the appellant Thomas Dorris as to the course of the court at the time of the hearing when the temporary injunction was continued, but, in view of the subsequent history of this case, we do not deem it necessary to discuss them here, as will appear later in the course of this opinion. Thereafter the respondents answered the complaint, and admitted the fact that the log jam existed, but alleged that the same was caused by the insufficient capacity of said stream to float logs, and by the mismanagement and unskilful manner of appellants in driving said logs, together with their gross negligence and want of care, and utter indifference to the injury resulting therefrom. They deny that said rock was in the bed of the stream, and aver that it was then, and for many years theretofore had been, imbedded in and formed a part of the west bank of said stream, where it was a valuable protection to the bank of the stream, and also formed a portion of the fence inclosing the cultivated lands of said Thomas Dorris, and was situated upon his land, and formed a part thereof. The respondent Thomas Dorris alleges that he is the sole owner of said land; that said stream is not a meandered stream or a public highway, and is not navigable where it flows through the said lands; that the said stream was duly surveyed and disposed of by the United States, long before the state of Washington was admitted into the Union, under and by virtue of the land laws of the United States, and is a private stream, not of sufficient size and volume at any stage of the water, in its natural state, to be of public utility, or to float saw logs to market, when it flows through the lands of said Thomas Dorris, or above said lands, but is a short mountain creek, depending upon the rainfall for the volume of its waters. The reply puts in issue the material averments of the answer. At the trial of the cause a large number of witnesses were examined. The statement of facts filed in this court contains more than 400 pages of transcribed testimony. As an advisory matter, the court submitted to a jury the questions of fact propounded by the interrogatories hereinafter set forth, and after due deliberation the jury returned their answers thereto as severally set forth below. The said interrogatories and answers are, respectively, as follows, to wit:

(1) Is the Elochoman river, above the lands of Thomas Dorris, a highway suitable for the running of logs?

A. Yes.

(2) Have the lands of Thomas Dorris been injured by the jam of November, 1897?

A. Yes.

(3) Was that jam the result of the want of ordinary care and prudence on the part of the plaintiffs?

A. Yes.

(4) What amount of land was damaged, and what is the value thereof?

A. 2.624 acres; $168.75.

(5) Did the defendant Thomas Dorris refuse at any time before the jam was broken to allow the plaintiffs or their agents to enter upon and break said jam, and, if so, what was the extent and value of the land damaged at the time of such refusal?

A. No.

Assignments of error as to the court's instructions to the jury are urged by counsel upon both sides, but we think the instructions substantially embody the law of the case. The court followed the findings of the jury upon the facts submitted to them, and thereafter, with other findings, entered the following findings of fact: "(3) That the Elochoman creek is about 18 miles in length, and empties into the Columbia river; that it has an average width of 100 feet and a depth of about 3 feet; that in its normal capacity it cannot be used for the floating of logs, but that there are annually recurring freshets of sufficient duration and with a sufficient volume of water to render said creek capable of being used profitably for the floating of logs to the Columbia river to market; that said creek has been so profitably used for a period covering the last twenty-five years. (4) That the said Elochoman creek is an unmeandered stream, unaffected by the rise and fall of the tide, save only for a short distance above the point where it empties into the Columbia river, and below the lands of said Thomas Dorris. (5) That the lands of plaintiff hereinbefore described are chiefly valuable for their timber, and that there is no other outlet to market, except by means of said Elochoman creek, where the same flows through the lands of said Thomas Dorris. (6) That, in addition to the lands of plaintiffs, there are large bodies of timber adjacent to said Elochoman creek, which are heavily timbered, and that the timber thereon cannot be conveyed to market except by means of said creek. (7) That during the early part of November, 1897, the plaintiffs, having theretofore placed in said creek a large number of logs, to wit, to the number of about 1,500, undertook, during a freshet, to run said logs down said Elochoman creek, where the same passes through the lands of said Thomas Dorris. (8) That at the time the plaintiffs so undertook to run said logs there was upon the banks of said stream, adjacent to and forming a part of the bank of said stream where the same passes through the land of said Thomas Dorris, a large rock, which had theretofore been imbedded in the bank, but which during frequent freshets had partially washed out from the bank; that said rock was so situated at the time said logs were run that the accumulation there at any one time, during a freshet, of a great volume of logs, would result in a jam, and the consequent spreading out of the water upon the neighboring lands, with damage resulting therefrom; that the fact that the above-described rock was situated as aforesaid, and that the floating of a large number of logs thereupon would result in the formation of a jam, was well known to plaintiffs before the running of said logs aforesaid. (9) That during the early part of the said month of November, 1897, the said plaintiffs caused to be turned loose in said creek, at a point above the lands of said Thomas Dorris, about 1,500 saw logs, many of them of considerable size and length, which said logs were, by the freshet then occurring, carried down to the said rock situated on the lands of Thomas Dorris; that there a jam was formed, and the waters of said creek were backed and caused to overflow upon the lands of Thomas Dorris, occasioning damage thereto in the sum of $166.75. (10) That the said damage as aforesaid resulted from the carelessness and negligence of the plaintiffs." Upon the facts as found, the following conclusions of law were entered: "(1) That the Elochoman creek, from the point where the same empties into the Columbia river, up to the lands of plaintiffs, is navigable for logs at sufficiently regularly recurring periods and for sufficient lengths of time to enable the same to be used profitably for the floating of saw logs to market. (2) That the public have a right to the use of said stream for the purpose of floating saw logs and other products of the forest to market, provided that said use be exercised with such reasonable care as will not endanger the property of the riparian proprietors. (3) That the plaintiffs are indebted to the defendant Thomas Dorris in the sum of $166.75, his damages so as aforesaid sustained."

It is contended that some of the important findings are not justified by the evidence, but an examination of the evidence convinces us that there was evidence upon which to found the findings; and, since the trial court heard all the evidence, we believe he is better qualified than this court to pass upon its weight and credibility. We find no error in the conclusions of law. Decree was entered, in accordance with the findings and conclusions, that the Elochoman creek, from the point where it empties into the Columbia river up to and through the lands of Thomas Dorris, and up to and through the lands of plaintiffs, is navigable for logs and other products of the forest; that the public have a right to use said Elochoman creek for the purpose of floating saw logs and other products of the forest to market, provided that said use be exercised with such reasonable care as will not endanger the property of riparian proprietors. The said Thomas Dorris was awarded damages in the sum of $166.75, together with his costs, and said William Dorris was awarded his costs. The temporary injunction theretofore issued against Thomas Dorris and William Dorris was dissolved.

The complaint of Thomas Dorris, on his appeal, that the court erred in the matter of granting and continuing the temporary injunction heretofore referred to in this opinion, we think, calls for no consideration here. If the court below committed error, this court cannot now reverse its proceedings in the matter of the temporary injunction, for the reason that any such error was corrected by the court itself when it dissolved the temporary injunction at the final hearing. If harm occurred by reason of the temporary injunction, the remedy is now by suit upon the injunction bond for wrongfully suing out the injunction.

The real question to be determined upon the merits is, What are the respective rights of the landowner and the log driver upon a stream of the character of Elochoman creek? The act of March 17, 1890 (Sess. Laws 1889-90, p. 470; Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, §§ 4378-4386, inclusive), defines the powers and duties of corporations organized for the purpose of building booms and catching logs and timber products therein. Section 9 of said act provides: "All meandered rivers, meandered sloughs, and navigable waters in this state shall be deemed as public highways, and said corporations shall be declared public corporations for the purpose of this act; and the improvement of such streams, sloughs, and waters shall be deemed and declared a public use and benefit." Under this section all "meandered rivers and meandered sloughs" shall be deemed as public highways for the purposes specified in the act, viz., booming and floating logs and timber. Nothing further is needed to establish them as such public highways, when it is shown that they are meandered. The section further provides that all "navigable waters" shall be deemed as public highways for the same purpose. If the stream is not meandered, it must then be determined whether it is or is not navigable in fact for floating logs or timber. If navigable for such purpose, it is a public highway for that purpose. The court finds Elochoman creek to be a short stream, 18 miles in length, with an average width of 100 feet, and a depth of about 3 feet, and that the stream can, during annually recurring freshets, be used profitably for the floating of logs to the Columbia river to market, and that it has been so profitably used for the last twenty-five years. The stream must therefore be held to be a public highway for the purpose of floating logs and timber to market. Being a public highway for such purpose, what are the relations of the landowner to the stream? Thomas Dorris is the owner of the land on both sides of the stream. If such a stream as this is included in the provisions of § 1, art. 17, of the Constitution of Washington, then the state is the owner of the bed of the stream below ordinary high-water mark. We do not believe, however, that the said constitutional provision was intended to include streams of the character of this one, but only such as are navigable for general commercial purposes. This stream is of such a character that its use as a public highway is restricted to one purpose, viz., that of floating logs or timber, and we think a distinction must be drawn between such streams and those which are highways for general trade and commerce. The title to the bed of the stream, therefore, passed from the government to the landowner, but it is subject to the right of the public to use the stream for floating logs and timber. This right is further given by virtue of the act of 1890 aforesaid to corporations, under conditions therein contained. Again, the same right is continued with further provisions under the act of March 18, 1895 (Sess. Laws 1895, p. 128; Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, §§ 4387-4394). These provisions have been held constitutional by this court in East Hoquiam Boom & Logging Co. v. Neeson, 20 Wash. 142, 54 Pac. 1001. With this right given to a corporation to use the stream as a public highway, there is no reason, in principle, why an individual or partnership, as in this case, may not use it as such. Indeed, if a corporation only could so use the stream, the act would be of doubtful force, because of its discrimination. The statute provides how such corporations may improve the stream, by removing obstructions, and they may also become common carriers to drive all the logs delivered into their charge, and may collect toll therefor. But the right of individuals or partnerships to use the stream as a highway cannot be denied. But neither such corporation nor individuals can interfere with the soil in a stream of the character of Elochoman creek, the bed of which is owned by the landowner, without the landowner's consent or by operation of law with due compensation made. The same reasoning applies with even greater force to the use of the banks of the stream, as was sought to be done in this case. Lovnsdale v. Gray's Harbor Boom Co. 21 Wash. 542, 547, 58 Pac. 663. Appellants, therefore, have the right to drive their logs down the stream as long as they do so without damage to the landowner. But, if the use of the freehold or shore rights are acquired, they must acquire them, either as individuals, or by condemnation in a corporate capacity, as provided by the statutes above mentioned.

It having been found that the jam was caused by the appellants' careless manner of driving the logs, the consequent damage to the land is chargeable to them; and, since we find no substantial error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

1. Upon a question arising under the Federal laws requiring full faith and credit to be given in each state to the judicial proceedings of every other state, courts will take judicial notice of the local laws of the state from which the record comes.

The Missouri policy came from one that looked to the reuniting of the divorced couple. So that there is, not only a conflict of the statute law of the two states and in every stage of its procedure, both in the trial court and in the appellate court, but the statutes come from different policies.

A court, in order to give effect to a foreign law, will not introduce in its own system a foreign remedy.

Mr. George E. De Steiguer, for the respondent bank:

Assuming that the defendant had anything subject to execution in the safe-deposit box, the contents of the box were not in the possession, or under the control, of this garnishee.

The bank has no possession for two reasons:

1. Possession "implies exclusive enjoyment." "It implies a present right to deal with the property at pleasure, and to exclude other persons from meddling with it."

18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 840; Sullivan v. Sullivan, 66 N. Y. 37.

2. There is not that element of intent necessary to constitute possession in the bank.

See Bouvier's Law Dict. Possession.

If there were any doubt about the meaning of the words "possession" and "control," that doubt is resolved by the provisions of the garnishment law itself. The possession and control referred to in § 3 of the garnishment act (Laws 1893, p. 96) must be such as will enable the garnishee to comply with the obligations imposed upon him by other provisions of the law,—such possession and control as will enable him to respond to the writ.

The Federal courts should guide this case.

White, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

"That at all the times herein mentioned the circuit court of the city of St. Louis in the state of Missouri, was, and ever since has been, and now is, a court of general jurisdiction over matters in equity and law, duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of said state. That on the 25th day of June, 1895, the defendant above named, Fred M. Spinning, commenced an action in said circuit court of the city of St. Louis, as plaintiff, against Lillie M. Spinning, she being the plaintiff here, who at that time was the wife of said Fred M. Spinning, and defendant, by filing his petition therein, which said action was entitled as follows, to wit: 'In the Circuit Court of the City of St. Louis, October, 1895, Fred M. Spinning, Plaintiff, v. Lillie M. Spinning, Defendant.' That upon the filing of said petition the clerk of said court, on the 25th day of June, 1895, duly issued a summons commanding the defendant therein, who is the plaintiff herein, to appear before the judges of said circuit court on the first day of the next term thereof to be held in the city of St. Louis, at the court house in said city, on the first Monday of October next following the day of the issuance thereof, then and there to answer the complaint of Fred M. Spinning as set forth, a copy of which was attached to said summons and said summons was duly sealed with the seal of said court and attested by the clerk on said day, and thereafter was duly served upon the defendant herein named, personally, at the city of St. Louis, in the state aforesaid, by the sheriff of said county, by delivering a copy thereof, with a copy of said petition, to said defendant personally, she being the plaintiff herein.

"That, after the service of process upon said defendant, the plaintiff herein, said Lillie M. Trowbridge, appeared by her attorney, Wm. McNamee, and in person, and thereafter such proceedings were had and done therein that said Lillie M. Trowbridge, then Lillie M. Spinning, filed her answer and cross complaint in said action against the said Fred M. Spinning, wherein she alleges that she was the injured person, praying, among other things, that she was entitled to a decree of divorce, and for her costs and alimony. That thereafter, and on the 29th day of January, 1896, such other and further proceedings were had in said action that a trial thereof was had on said day, wherein and whereby said court ordered, decreed, and rendered judgment therein against the said Fred M. Spinning, granting the defendant therein a complete decree of divorce, she being the plaintiff here, together with judgment against said Fred M. Spinning for the sum of $5,000 as and for alimony in gross, and further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said Fred M. Spinning pay the costs of said proceeding, and that execution issue therefor. And that said decree was duly made, entered, enrolled, and docketed in said court dissolving the bonds of matrimony and rendering judgment as aforesaid, and that no part of said judgment and decree has ever been paid.

"That under and by virtue of the provisions of the Revised Statutes of the state of Missouri, chap. 28, p. 360, of volume 1, for the year 1879, such judgment and decree rendered as aforesaid has the force and effect of a judgment at law for the payment of money. That such is the construction thereof, and the force and effect to be given to the same, as determined by the supreme court of said state of Missouri, and such is the law of said state. That by reason thereof plaintiff is advised and believes, and therefore alleges the fact to be, and that, under and by virtue of the Constitution of the United States (§ 1, art. 4), she has a good right to bring her cause of action as aforesaid in the courts of the state of Washington, and to have and recover of the said defendant the sum of $5,000, awarded to her as aforesaid, and that the courts of the state of Washington will give the same force and effect to said decree as is given thereto in the state of Missouri.

"Plaintiff hereby refers to §§ 2179, 2180, 2184, and 2185 of volume 1 of the Revised Statutes of the state of Missouri of 1879, and attaches hereto full and complete copies of said sections aforesaid; the same being marked as Exhibit A, and made a part and parcel thereof to all intents and purposes as fully as though copied at length herein."

The sections of the Revised Statutes of the state of Missouri referred to in § 4 of the complaint are as follows:

"Sec. 2179. When a divorce shall be adjudged the court shall make such order touching the alimony and maintenance of the wife, and the care, custody, and maintenance of the children or any of them, as from the circumstances of the parties and the nature of the case shall be reasonable, and, when the wife is plaintiff, may order the defendant to give security for such alimony and maintenance; and upon his neglect to give the security required of him, or upon default of himself and his securities, if any there be, to pay or provide such alimony and maintenance, may award an execution for the collection thereof or enforce the performance of the judgment or order by sequestration of property or by such other lawful ways and means as is according to the practice of the court. The court on the application of either party may make such alteration from time to time as to the allowance of alimony and maintenance as may be proper, and the court may decree alimony pending the suit for divorce in all cases where the same would be just, whether the wife be plaintiff or defendant, and enforce such order in the manner provided by law in other cases.

"Sec. 2180. Upon a decree of divorce in favor of the wife the court may, in its discretion, decree alimony in gross or from year to year. When alimony is decreed in gross such decree shall be a general lien on the realty of the party against whom the decree may be rendered as in the case of other judgments. When a decree is for alimony from year to year such decree shall not be a lien on the realty as aforesaid, but an execution in the hands of the proper officer, issued for the purpose of enforcing such decree, shall constitute a lien on the real and personal property of the defendant in such execution so long as the same shall lawfully remain in the possession of said officer unsatisfied."

"Sec. 2184. No final judgment or order rendered in cases arising under this chapter shall be reversed, annulled, or modified in the supreme or any other court by appeal or writ of error unless such appeal shall have been granted during the term of court at which the judgment or order appealed from was rendered, or unless such writ of error shall have been issued within sixty days after the order was made or judgment was rendered.

"Sec. 2185. No petition for review of any judgment for divorce rendered in any case arising under this chapter shall be allowed any law or statute to the contrary notwithstanding; but there may be a review of any order or judgment touching the alimony and maintenance of the wife, and the care, custody, and maintenance of the children, or any of them, as in other cases."

The prayer of the complaint was for judgment against the defendant Fred M. Spinning for the sum of $5,000, with interest thereon from the 26th day of January, 1896, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, and for costs, etc. The respondent Spinning demurred to this complaint on the ground that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against him. This demurrer, upon hearing, was sustained, and judgment was entered dismissing the action. On September 6, 1899, at the time the plaintiff filed her original complaint in the superior court of King county, state of Washington, a writ of garnishment was issued and served upon the Washington National Bank, First National Bank, National Bank of Commerce, Seattle Safe-Deposit Vaults, Incorporated,—all of the city of Seattle,—as garnishee defendants. All of the garnishee defendants appeared, and the Seattle Safe-Deposit Vaults, Incorporated, and the Washington National Bank denied generally, and these answers were controverted. The First National Bank admitted that it had on deposit the sum of $266.19 to the credit of the respondent. The garnishee defendant the National Bank of Commerce answered stating: That the respondent had in its vaults a safe-deposit box, to which there was a private and a master's key, the private key being in the possession of the respondent, and the master's key in the possession of the garnishee defendant, and to open said box it is necessary—First, for the master's key to be used; second, for the private key to be used. That the contents of the box were unknown to the garnishee defendant. To the vault there was a vault door, locked by a time combination, which was under the exclusive charge of the garnishee defendant. Upon the issues formed by the answer of the garnishee defendant the National Bank of Commerce, proof was taken; and the court made findings of fact and conclusions of law, and discharged said garnishee defendant, and to said conclusions of law the appellant excepts. This order was made prior to the sustaining of the demurrer to the amended complaint. At the time of the sustaining of the demurrer to the amended complaint an order was made discharging all of the garnishee defendants. From said order and the sustaining of said demurrer to the amended complaint, and the judgment dismissing said action, this appeal is taken. The findings of fact and conclusions of law in relation to the garnishment against the National Bank of Commerce are as follows:

"That on the 14th day of October, 1898, said garnishee rented of said defendant, for one year, a compartment and box in the safety-deposit vaults of the said garnishee, and at the time of said renting gave to said defendant a receipt of which the following is a copy, to wit: 'No. 531. Seattle, Wash., Oct. 14, 1898. Received of Fred M. Spinning the sum of three and $\frac{100}{100}$ dollars in payment of rent for safety-deposit box No. 80, from Oct. 14, 1898, to Oct. 14, 1899. The National Bank of Commerce, by W. H. Wright. Read agreement on back,'—on the back of which receipt was the following indorsement, to wit: 'Read This Agreement. It is understood and agreed by and between the National Bank of Commerce and the lessee that, in case of the loss of the key of said box, it will be replaced only at the expense of the lessee, and the National Bank of Commerce shall not be responsible in any way for such loss. It is further understood and agreed by and between the National Bank of Commerce that said bank may refuse access to said box to any agent of the lessee not regularly designated by an instrument in writing filed with the bank.' (2) That the said defendant ever since the said 14th day of October, 1898, has continued to hold said box and compartment under said contract and lease. (3) That said box is an ordinary tin box inclosed within said compartment, and said compartment is closed with a door fitted with a lock. At the time of renting said box and compartment, the garnishee delivered to the defendant two duplicate keys

The method of opening said box and compartment is as follows: Said garnishee, through one of its employees, turns in said lock what is known as a 'master's key,' after which the keys furnished to the defendant will unlock the lock of said compartment, and permit the same to be opened. Said master's key will not unlock said lock. Said garnishee did not retain, and has not now, and has not at any time since renting said box and compartment had, any key whatsoever with which to open the said box or compartment, and has not now, and has not at any time, since renting said box and compartment, had, any means of opening or obtaining access to said compartment or box.

(4) Said master's key is not used for the purpose of giving said garnishee access to said box or compartment, but as a check on fraud and imposture, and to prevent unauthorized persons having access thereto. (5) Said garnishee has no information or knowledge as to what, if any, the contents of said box and compartment are, and no evidence has been introduced as to what such contents are, or whether said box contains anything save and except to the effect that the garnishee has been informed by the defendant that there are in said box papers belonging to other persons than the defendant. (6) Said garnishee has no means of ascertaining the contents of said box and compartment, and has no information, and is unable to ascertain, whether or not said box and compartment contain anything subject to execution, attachment, garnishment, or anything whatsoever. (7) That the sum of fifty dollars ($50) is a reasonable sum to be allowed the garnishee as an attorney's fee. (8) At the time of the service of said writ said garnishee was not, and has not since been, indebted to defendant; nor has it had in its possession or under its control any property or effects of defendant, except as above set forth.

"Conclusions of Law: From the foregoing facts the court concludes, as a matter of law, that the garnishee the National Bank of Commerce is entitled to judgment discharging it upon its said answer, and for its costs against the plaintiff, including a reasonable attorney's fee, to wit, the sum of fifty dollars ($50)."

The errors assigned are as follows:

"(1) The court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the amended complaint. (2) The court erred in discharging the garnishee defendant the National Bank of Commerce. (3) The court erred in discharging the other garnishee defendants."

The first point urged by the respondent against this complaint is that the authority of the circuit court of the city of St. Louis in proceedings for divorce and alimony is not shown or alleged in this complaint. It is alleged that the circuit court of the city of St. Louis at all the times mentioned in the complaint was and is a court of general jurisdiction over matters in equity and law, duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of Missouri. "Questions of divorce and alimony," says the learned counsel for the respondent Spinning, "are regulated by statutory provisions only, and the jurisdiction of courts over them cannot be extended beyond the statute authority. Proceedings in such matters are not according to the course of the common law, and there is no presumption in favor of the regularity of courts of general jurisdiction in such cases." Where a question arises under that part of the Constitution of the United States and the act of Congress which requires full faith and credit to be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state, our courts will take judicial notice of the local laws of the state from which the record comes. Ohio v. Hinchman, 27 Pa. 483; Paine v. Schenectady Ins. Co. 11 R. I. 415; Rae v. Hulbert, 17 Ill. 576. The supreme court of Pennsylvania, where the question was as to the jurisdiction of the probate courts of Ohio, in Ohio v. Hinchman, 27 Pa. 483, says: "The questions before us arise under the Constitution and laws of the United States. Full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state, says the Federal Constitution; and the act of Congress of 26th May, 1790, providing for the mode of authenticating the records and judicial proceedings of the state courts, declares that 'the records and judicial proceedings, authenticated as aforesaid, shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States, as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from whence the said records are or shall be taken.' A judgment of this court adverse to the right arising out of the Federal Constitution and legislation would be reviewable in the Supreme Court of the United States, and there the states of the Confederacy are not regarded as foreign states, whose laws and usages must be proved, but as domestic institutions, whose laws are to be noticed without pleading or proof. It would be a very imperfect and discordant administration for the court of original jurisdiction to adopt one rule of decision, while the court of final resort was governed by another; and hence it follows that in questions of this sort we should take notice of the local laws of a sister state in the same manner the Supreme Court of the United States would do on a writ of error to our judgment. Ferguson v. Harwood, 7 Cranch, 408, 3 L. ed. 380; Mills v. Duryce, 7 Cranch, 481, 3 L. ed. 411; Hampton v. M'Connell, 3 Wheat. 234, 4 L. ed. 378; Baxley v. Linah, 16 Pa. 243, 55 Am. Dec. 494." The supreme court of Illinois, in Rae v. Hulbert, 17 Ill. 576, says: "While for many, if not for most, purposes, the several states of the Union are, as to each other, considered and treated as foreign states, yet it is not strictly so as to the judgments rendered by their several courts. I will not quote from the Constitution and laws of the Federal government, but from the opinion of this court in the case of Welch v. Sykes, 8 Ill. 199, 44 Am. Dec. 680. It is there said: 'Under the Constitution of the United States, and laws made in pursuance thereof, the judgments in personam of the various states are placed on the footing of domestic judgments, and they are to receive the same credit and effect when sought to be enforced in different states, as they, by law or usage, have in the particular states where rendered.' We are then to treat this judgment, or give it the same effect, as if rendered by one of our own courts, or as if this were a proceeding in New York. We do not hesitate to declare that it is our duty to take notice that the supreme court of New York had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the same presumptions arise in favor of the jurisdiction of the person, and of the regularity of the proceeding, that would arise upon a domestic judgment. How far those presumptions arise in favor of the jurisdiction of the person, it is not necessary now to discuss particularly, for that is a question rather of evidence than of pleading. Though it may be necessary, when used as evidence, that the record should show such facts as are necessary to give the court jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, or at least as raise a presumption of jurisdiction, yet it is not necessary that such facts should be set out in the pleading. It is only necessary to aver that, by the consideration of the court, a judgment was rendered against the defendant. The implication is that it was a valid judgment, and that is sufficient to lay the foundation for the proof of every fact necessary to show that it was a valid judgment." The supreme court of Wisconsin, in Kunze v. Kunze, 94 Wis. 54, 68 N. W. 391, which was an action to recover alimony adjudged to the plaintiff in a divorce action brought in Illinois, says: "This is an action brought to recover alimony adjudged to the plaintiff in a divorce action heretofore brought in Illinois. It appears by the complaint that the court in which the divorce action was brought—i. e., the circuit court of Cook county, Illinois—was a court of general jurisdiction, as its name indicates. Hence it was unnecessary to allege any jurisdictional facts. Jarvis v. Robinson, 21 Wis. 524, 94 Am. Dec. 560. The allegation that the judgment was rendered in that court, and that it was afterwards duly amended, are sufficient in the first instance. From these facts jurisdiction is presumed. If in fact there was any want of jurisdiction, it is a fact to be set up by answer. Ibid." For the reasons given in these decisions, which we think are sound, we take judicial notice that the circuit court of the city of St. Louis had jurisdiction to render the judgment alleged.

It is further objected that the appellant alleges that she filed her answer and cross-complaint, but she fails to allege that the same was served. This objection is also answered in the quotation from the cases of Rae v. Hulbert, 17 Ill. 570, and Kunze v. Kunze, 94 Wis. 54, 68 N. W. 391. Besides, we take judicial notice that under the laws of Missouri in all suits for divorce the defendant may set up in defense to the action in the answer any facts which, if proved, would entitle the defendant to a divorce, and in such answer pray to be divorced from the plaintiff, and on the hearing of the cause the court can grant the defendant a divorce, if satisfied the defendant was the injured party. 1 Mo. Rev. Stat. 1879, § 2176. The complaint sufficiently alleges that she appeared in the action and filed her answer alleging she was the injured person praying for the decree, etc., and that such proceedings in the action were had that she obtained the judgment alleged. Whether the answer was served or not is immaterial. That is a mere matter of practice. It was filed, and the allegations of the complaint are sufficient to admit proof by exemplified copy of the record of the issues tried, and upon which the judgment was rendered.

The principal contention of the respondent Spinning is that the judgment for $5,000, as for alimony in gross, given by the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, is not a final judgment, because the statute of Missouri provides that the court, on the application of either party, may make such alteration from time to time as to the allowance of alimony as may be proper; that the judgment of a sister state cannot be sued upon in this state unless it is final and conclusive in the state where it was rendered, according to the law of that state. We are now called upon to determine a question arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and we should look as far as possible to the decisions of the Federal courts for guidance. The case of Barber v. Barber, 21 How. 582, 16 L. ed. 226, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1858, as we view it, is decisive of this case. That was a case arising under a suit in equity in the district court of the United States for the district of Wisconsin, wherein by the decree the wife, by her next friend, the plaintiff in the suit, was awarded a judgment for $5,936.80 on a decree of divorce from bed and board given by the state courts of New York, and decreeing alimony to the wife in the annual sum of $360 in each and every year. The respondent Spinning insists, however, that under the laws of New York the decree for alimony in that case was final, and that that case must be distinguished from the one at bar. The precise point insisted upon here was undoubtedly before the Supreme Court of the United States and considered in that case. In the dissenting opinion of Justice Daniel, he says: "The second error in the position before mentioned is shown by the character and objects of the allowance made as alimony to a wife. This allowance is not in the nature of an absolute debt. It is not unconditional, but always dependent upon the personal merits and conduct of the wife,—merits and conduct which must exist and continue in order to constitute a valid claim to such an allowance. This allowance might unquestionably be forfeited upon proof of criminality or misconduct of the wife, who would not be permitted to enforce the payment of that to which it should be shown she had lost all just claim; and this inhibition, it is presumed, might embrace as well a portion of that allowance at any time in arrears, as its demand in future. The essential character, then, of this allowance, viz., its being always conditional and dependent, both for its origin and continuation, upon the circumstances which produced or justified it, is demonstrative of the propriety and the necessity of submitting it to the control of that authority whose province it was to judge of those circumstances. That authority can exist nowhere but with the power and the right to control the private and domestic relations of life. The Federal government has no such power. It has no commission of censor morum over the several states and their people." P. 603, 21 How., and p. 233, 16 L. ed. And it is said in the opinion of the majority of the court that "alimony decreed to a wife in a divorce of separation from bed and board is as much a debt of record, until the decree has been recalled, as any other judgment for money is." P. 595, 21 How., and p. 230, 16 L. ed. From this it would seem that the Supreme Court of the United States understood that under the New York decree the allowance might be forfeited, and the decree annulled or recalled, for the subsequent immoral conduct of the wife. The case of Erkenbrach v. Erkenbrach, 96 N. Y. 456, relied upon by respondent, was decided in 1884; and the point involved was whether the plaintiff, who had obtained a decree in 1869 which had made no provision for her support could ten years afterwards, by petition in the same case, be then allowed alimony. The court held that she could not, and in deciding that proposition said: "The question presented by this appeal is whether a court has power after the entry of a final decree in an action for limited divorce, establishing a cause of action in favor of the wife, to order an additional allowance for her support. . . . The question comes back to the interpretation of our own statute. No case has been cited in our courts where an application for the allowance for the support of the wife after final decree has been made, except in the case of Kamp v. Kamp, 59 N. Y. 219, where the allowance was refused. That was a case of absolute divorce, but no distinction is seen to exist between such a case and one of limited divorce. The statutes authorizing such an allowance in the final decree are similar in both cases, and the power of the court to make such order after final decree is given and prescribed in the same language by the same section. . . . By expressly authorizing an order to be made after judgment providing only for the 'care, custody, and education of the children of the marriage,' it has impliedly prohibited such an order for any other cause." The allowance to the wife is in the nature of a debt due from one party to the other. The supreme court of Missouri has held that the statutory authority to alter a decree as to alimony or the custody of the children can only be exercised upon new facts occurring after the trial. Deidesheimer v. Deidesheimer, 74 Mo. App. 54 L. R. A.

236. Unless such facts occur, there can be no alteration of the decree. An ordinary judgment or decree in a suit at law or in equity may be discharged by payment, or new facts might arise after judgment warranting its discharge or modification by the court, and proceedings by petition in the same suit might be entertained by the court for that purpose. That would not affect the finality in the first instance. So, in the case at bar, facts might occur after the decree, such as indicated by Justice Daniels, which would authorize the court to recall the decree. The proceedings in the action to bring these facts to the attention of the court would be in the nature of a new suit. In this case the husband has removed from the jurisdiction of the Missouri court, probably carrying with him all his property, and, from what the record discloses, has taken no steps to modify the decree; and, if his contention here is correct, he need take no such steps. By pursuing this course he prevents any payment of the judgment of the Missouri court, no matter how able to respond he may be. "Final judgments," says Blackstone, "are such as at once put an end to the action, by declaring that the plaintiff has either entitled himself, or has not, to recover the remedy he sues for." 3 Bl. Com. 398. The plaintiff in this action, by the answer in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis in the case of Fred M. Spinning against her, put an end to that action, and recovered the remedy she sued for; and for the purpose of that action, so far as the issues then joined, the judgment was final, within Blackstone's definition. Facts might or might not subsequently arise which would destroy the effects of the judgment or modify it, but these would only furnish grounds for what we have seen would practically be a new suit. To give effect, as required by § 1, art. 4, of the Constitution of the United States, and the acts of Congress passed in pursuance thereof, to the judgment alleged in the complaint, we hold it to be final, and, in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in Barber v. Barber, 21 How. 582, 16 L. ed. 226, "as much a debt of record until the decree has been recalled, as any other judgment for money is." Should any modification thereof be hereafter made in the courts of Missouri, our courts, by proper proceedings instituted therein, will give effect to such modification, thereby carrying out the requirements of the Federal Constitution. If any modification was made before this action was instituted, it can be pleaded by way of a defense or counterclaim in this action. In the case of Barber v. Barber, 21 How. 582, 16 L. ed. 226, it was also held that a decree awarding alimony rendered in any state of the United States, the court having jurisdiction, will be carried into judgment in any other state, to have there the same binding force that it has in the state in which it was originally given, and that for such purpose both the equity courts of the United States and the same courts of the state have jurisdiction. In Kunze v. Kunze, 94 Wis.

54, 68 N. W. 391, the supreme court of Wisconsin says: "If a divorce judgment decree the payment of a specific sum absolutely as alimony, and if (as alleged in this case) such a decree has the effect in that state of a judgment at law for the payment of money, there seems no reason why such a decree may not be enforced by action at law in another state." The law of Missouri expressly enacts that, when alimony is decreed in gross, such decree shall be a general lien on the realty of the party against whom the decree may be rendered, as in the case of other judgments. For the reasons given herein, we think the lower court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the amended complaint.

The second assignment of error is that the court erred in discharging the garnishee respondent the National Bank of Commerce, from whom the respondent Spinning had rented a compartment and box in its safety-deposit vaults. Under our laws the writ of garnishment commands the garnishee to answer on oath, not only as to his indebtedness to the defendant, but also as to the personal property or effects of the defendant in possession of the garnishee or under his control. 2 Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 5393. From and after the service of the writ, it shall not be lawful for the garnishee to pay to the defendant any debt or to deliver to him any effects, and any such payment or delivery shall be void and of no effect as to so much of the debts and effects as may be necessary to satisfy the plaintiff's demand. Id. § 5398. Should it appear from the garnishee's answer or otherwise that the garnishee had in his possession, or under his control, property or effects of the defendant liable to execution, the court shall render a decree requiring the garnishee to deliver up to the sheriff on demand such personal property or effects, or so much of them as may be necessary to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. Id. § 5404. The answer of the garnishee may be controverted by the plaintiff or defendant. An issue shall be formed and tried under the direction of the court. Id. §§ 5409-5411. When the writ is served the garnishee is to retain control of the effects of the debtor until the court shall order that part liable to execution turned over to the sheriff. The writ is in aid of the writ of execution. Under § 5404, supra, the court is required to ascertain whether the garnishee has under his control, or not, any effects of the defendant liable to execution, and the court shall thereupon render a decree requiring the garnishee to deliver such effects to the sheriff. The language of the statute is, "Should it appear from the garnishee's answer or otherwise that the garnishee has in his possession or under his control, or had when the writ was served, any personal property or effects of the defendant liable to execution, the court shall render a decree requiring the garnishee to deliver up to the sheriff on demand such personal property or effects or so much of them as may be necessary to satisfy the plaintiff's claim." § 5404, supra. And this 54 L. R. A.

answer must be a true answer as to the several matters inquired of in the writ. § 5399. This means that there shall be a hearing by the court preliminary to such decree, and that the court shall ascertain from the answer or otherwise whether or not the garnishee has under his control effects of the debtor liable to execution. There was a trial in this case to ascertain these facts. The only question, however, inquired into by the court on the answer of the garnishee, was touching the manner in which the box was locked, and the control of the garnishee over the box. The answer of the garnishee nowhere alleges that it did not have effects of the defendant under its control. In substance, it says it did not have such effects, unless they were in the box, and the answer then states the facts touching the control of the box. No evidence was introduced as to the contents of the box. It was simply as to the manner of control. From the conclusions of law, the findings of fact, the evidence, and the brief of the garnishee, it is evident that the only question considered by the court below and passed upon was whether the garnishee had control of the effects in the box. If we are correct in this we are of the opinion that the court erred in holding that the garnishee did not have control of the contents of the box. At any time on the request of the defendant the garnishee could put it within the power of the defendant to remove the contents of the box, and the defendant could not remove the contents without the consent and active co-operation of the garnishee. As against the defendant, then, the garnishee had control of the contents of the box. It is true that it was impossible for the garnishee to answer specifically as to the contents of the box. The court, however, under § 5404, supra, is authorized to determine from the answer or otherwise the effects under the control of the garnishee liable to execution. Under the broad provisions of this section, the court could inquire into the contents of the box by causing the defendant to be examined as a witness, and might even require an inspection of the contents, to the end that the effects liable to execution should be delivered to the sheriff. In the meantime, after the service of the writ, it would be the duty of the garnishee to retain exclusive control of the box until discharged by the court. Should the defendant desire to remove from the box articles not liable to execution, the court, under proper restrictions, could allow the same.

From what we have said, it follows that the court erred in discharging the garnishee respondent the National Bank of Commerce. The court also erred in discharging the other garnishees herein, resulting from its decision that the amended complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court also erred in sustaining the demurrer to said amended complaint, and in dismissing this action, and in awarding costs herein to respondent Spinning and the garnishee respondents.

In all the particulars herein enumerated

the court below is reversed. This action is remanded to the court below, with instructions to proceed with the hearing of this case as in this opinion indicated. The appellant is also entitled to her costs on this appeal against the respondent Spinning and the respondent the National Bank of Commerce.

NORTHWESTERN LUMBER COMPANY,
Appt.,
v.

CHEHALIS COUNTY et al., Resp'ts.

1. Ocean-going tugboats are not exempt from taxation by the state in whose waters they are exclusively employed, by the fact that they are registered and taxed at a port in another state, where their owner is domiciled.
2. The collection of a tax cannot be enjoined because the person by whom it was assessed had no right to the office of assessor, if he was a de facto assessor properly exercising the functions of the office.

(April 29, 1901.)

APPPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Chehalis County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin the collection of taxes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Sidney Moor Heath, for appellant:

The legal situs of vessels employed in navigation is, for purposes of taxation, the port where they are registered under the laws of the United States as their home port. The situs dependent on registration continues until a new situs is acquired, and is not lost by absence or employment elsewhere.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. p. 965, § 787, and cases cited in note 3.

A vessel enrolled and licensed or registered under United States navigation laws, and owned by a nonresident of the state, does not become subject to the taxing powers of the state by engaging in business therein.

See Roberts v. Charlevoix Twp. 60 Mich. 197, 26 N. W. 878.

A tax upon a vessel in another state than that which contains its home port is an interference with commerce of the country, which is not permitted to the state.

Mr. W. H. Abel, for respondents:

The acts of a tax officer de facto do not invalidate an assessment made within the scope of the authority of his office.

Black, Tax Titles, 2d ed. § 93; Ronken-dorff v. Taylor, 4 Pet. 349, 7 L. ed. 882; Cooley, Taxn. 256; Sawyer v. Dooley, 21 Nev. 390, 32 Pac. 437; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 330; 1 Desty, Taxn. 510.

While such vessels are presumptively taxable at the port of registration, yet this presumption is rebuttable. The question is at least one of situs in fact, and where this is shown neither foreign registry nor foreign ownership is of any consequence.

National Dredging Co. v. State, 99 Ala. 462, 12 So. 720; Johnson v. De Bary-Baya Merchants' Line, 37 Fla. 499, 37 L. R. A. 518, 19 So. 640.

Reavis, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Suit to enjoin the collection of taxes levied upon property belonging to appellant in Chehalis county. The assessor listed and assessed to appellant some reservoirs and lines of pipes in the town of Hoquiam, and also listed and assessed three steam tugs,—the Traveler, Astoria, and Printer. The complaint states that the acts of the assessor were invalid, and questions his right to his office as assessor, and alleges that he arbitrarily, fraudulently, and maliciously overvalued property in the waterworks; that the tugs were ocean-going tugs, and in use wherever charters were available; that each was registered, under § 4319, Rev. Stat. U. S., at the port of San Francisco, and was assessed and paid taxes in the state of California; that plaintiff was a corporation organized under the laws of California, and qualified to do business in the state of Washington. The superior court, after trial, found substantially the following facts: That the tugs Traveler, Astoria, and Printer and the waterworks were assessed at a fair cash valuation required by law; that all the property mentioned was a part of the taxable personal property situate in Chehalis county, and said tugs, and each thereof, were so blended with the personal property in general situated in said county that it was impossible to distinguish it therefrom; that such property, and the whole thereof, was controlled at Hoquiam by the resident management of the plaintiff corporation, and each of said tugs was and has been engaged in plying wholly within the waters of this state. It concluded that the tax was legal and justly due, and rendered judgment dismissing the action.

The material controversy here is the validity of the assessment upon the three tugs. Counsel for plaintiff urges that, as these tugs were registered in the port of San Francisco, they are not liable to taxation in this state. The question is not entirely free from doubt. In 1854 the right to tax a vessel engaged in interstate commerce was considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in Hays v. Pacific Mail S. S. Co. 17 How. 596, 15 L. ed. 254. The facts were that the steamship company was incorporated under the laws of New York; that all the stockholders were residents and citizens of that state; that the principal office for transacting business was in the city of New York, but the company had agencies in the cities of Panama, New Grenada, and San Francisco, California, and had a naval yard and ship yard for repairs at Benicia, California; that, on the arrival of the ships at the port of San Francisco, they remained no longer than to land passengers, mail, and freight, usually done in a day, and then proceeded to Benicia for repairs and refitting until the commencement of the next voyage, usually some ten or twelve days; that the business they were engaged in was transportation of passengers and merchandise, treasure, and the United States mail between the city of New York and the city of San Francisco, by way of Panama, and between San Francisco and different ports in the territory of Oregon; that the company was the sole owner of the vessels, and no portion of the interest was owned by citizens of California; that the vessels were all ocean steamships, employed exclusively in navigating the ocean, and each of them was registered at the custom house in New York, where the owners resided; that taxes had been assessed upon all the capital of the company represented by the steamers in the state of New York under the laws of that state; that the vessels were assessed in the county of San Francisco, California, and the suit was to recover taxes paid under protest. The tax collector demurred to the complaint, and judgment was given for the plaintiffs. The court, in affirming the judgment, referred to the Federal statutes of the 31st of December, 1792, and the 29th of July, 1850, which provide for the registration of vessels at the port which shall be at or nearest the owner, if there be but one, or, if more than one, nearest the place where the husband or the acting and managing owner usually resides, and also the provision for the recording of bills of sales, mortgages, and conveyances in the office of the collector of customs where the vessel is registered or enrolled, and observed: "These provisions, and others that might be referred to, very clearly indicate that the domicile of a vessel that requires to be registered, if we may so speak, or home port, is the port at which she is registered, and which must be the nearest to the place where the owner or owners reside." In speaking of the vessels, it was said: "They are thus engaged in the business and commerce of the country, upon the highway of nations, touching at such ports and places as these great interests demand, and which hold out to the owners sufficient inducements by the profits realized or expected to be realized. And, so far as respects the ports and harhors within the United States, they are entered and cargoes discharged or laden on board, independently of any control over them, except as it respects such municipal and sanitary regulations of the local authorities as are not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the general government, to which belongs the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and between the states. . . . Besides, whether the vessel, leaving her home port for trade and commerce, visits, in the course of her voyage or business, several ports, or confines her operations in the carrying trade to one, are questions that will depend upon the profitable returns of the business, and will furnish no more evidence that she has become a part of the personal property within the state, and liable to taxation at one port than at the others. She is within the jurisdiction of all or any one of them temporarily, and for a purpose wholly excluding the idea of permanently abiding in the state, or changing her home port." Again, in Morgan v. Parham, 16 Wall. 471, 21 L. ed. 303, the facts were that a vessel, the Frances, was brought to Mobile, Alabama, which was duly registered at the port of New York, under the ownership of the plaintiff, according to the acts of Congress. The plaintiff was, and had since remained, a citizen of New York, and the vessel was the property of the plaintiff. The vessel was assessed as personal property in the city of Mobile. The tax remaining unpaid, the vessel was seized by the collector of the city. The owner brought an action for trespass against the collector for such seizure, and the collector justified by virtue of his tax warrant. The vessel was brought to Mobile in 1865. From that time until 1870 it had been employed as a coasting steamer between Mobile and New Orleans. In January, 1867, the vessel was regularly enrolled at the custom house by her master as a coaster, and license was issued in 1868 and 1869 as a coaster, and the Frances was one among several of a daily line of steamers plying between Mobile and New Orleans. The captain of the vessel was a resident of Mobile, and the agent conducting the business of the vessel at Mobile was resident there, occupying an office for such business, and paid the persons who assisted him, but was under the control of his superior agent, residing in New Orleans, who employed and paid the captain. A wharf and office in Mobile were occupied for the use of the vessels. They transported the mails, freight, and passengers between Mobile and New Orleans. The court held the tax was invalid, and said: "The fact that the vessel was physically within the limits of the city of Mobile at the time the tax was levied does not decide the question. Thus, if a traveler on that day had been passing through that city in his private carriage, or an emigrant with his worldly goods on a wagon, it is not contended that the property of either of these persons would be subject to taxation as property within the city. It is conceded by the respective counsel that it would not have been. On the other hand, this vessel, although a vehicle of commerce, was not exempt from taxation on that score. A steamboat or a post coach engaged in a local business within a state may be subject to local taxation, although it carry the mail of the United States. The commerce between the states may not be interfered with by taxation or other interruption, but its instruments and vehicles may be. It is not, therefore, upon this principle that we are to decide the case. . . . The imposition in this class of cases was a tax upon the use of the public waters of the country, and tended immediately to interfere with and to obstruct the commerce between the states. In the instance before us the tax was upon a vessel at the wharf. It was in this respect as if a tax had been laid upon lumber or cotton lying on the dock at Mobile. This vessel was owned by, and employed in the service of, a resident of the state of New York. It was primarily and presumptively taxable under the authority of that state, and of that state only." And again the court concludes: "It is the opinion of the court that the state of Alabama had no jurisdiction over this vessel for the purpose of taxation, for the reason that it had not become incorporated into the personal property of that state, but was there temporarily only, and that it was engaged in lawful commerce between the states, with its situs at the home port of New York, where it belonged, and where its owner was liable to be taxed for its value." It is also said that it was immaterial whether the steamer, the Frances, was actually taxed in New York or not; she was liable to taxation there. Again, in Moran v. New Orleans, 112 U. S. 69, 28 L. ed. 653, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 38, a municipal ordinance of the city of New Orleans to establish the rate of license for professions, callings, and other business, which assessed and directed to be collected from persons owning and running towboats to and from the Gulf of Mexico and the city of New Orleans was adjudged to be a regulation of commerce among the states and invalid. It will be observed that the first two cases seem to put the invalidity of the tax upon the ground of an interference with commerce among the states, the regulation of which is exclusively with Congress; and in each instance the vessels were engaged in interstate commerce, and were only temporarily in the ports where the tax was attempted to be levied. We have been unable to find any adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States specifically determining that the registry of the vessel conclusively fixes its situs. The registry is presumptive evidence of such situs. Counsel have, however, referred us to an authority (Roberts v. Charlevoix Twp. 60 Mich. 197, 26 N. W. 878) which seems to determine that a vessel enrolled, licensed, or registered under the United States navigation laws does not, by engaging in business within a state, become subject to its taxing power if the owner is a nonresident. Again, in the case of Johnson v. De Bary-

Baya Merchants' Line, 37 Fla. 499, 37 L. R. A. 518, 19 So. 640, the facts were that the vessel was owned by a corporation of New York, with its headquarters and chief office in the city of New York, and was duly registered in the custom house at that port, and a tax had been regularly levied upon it in New York. The New York corporation maintained a line of boats on St. John's river for a portion of the year, engaged in the business incident to steamboats plying upon a river; but at different times the vessels went to any other waters which supported profitable engagements, and were engaged upon waters in other states. It was adjudged that the state of Florida could not levy a tax upon the vessels, the court observing: "Under the admitted facts of this case, we are of the opinion that the vessels of the appellee were not subject to taxation in Duval county. The vessels were owned by a New York corporation, and had acquired a situs in that state by being duly registered in the port of New York, the nearest to the residence of the owner, and were engaged in commerce in that state, where, it is conceded, the most profitable employment could be procured for them. The mere fact of being employed in interstate commerce would not exempt them from taxation, and we do not say that registration in a foreign port and nonresident ownership should control absolutely, but such ownership and registration render them primarily and presumptively taxable only in their home port." But in the well-considered case of National Dredging Co. v. State, 99 Ala. 462, 12 So. 720, the facts were that the dredging company was a Delaware corporation, and the tugboat was registered at Wilmington, Delaware, and afterwards was in Mobile bay for a long time, engaged in dredging in connection with other scows and machinery owned by the same company. The contract for dredging was with the government of the United States. The court observed of the tugboat Curtis: ". . . A special consideration is advanced in support of its non-taxability. It is a seagoing vessel, propelled by steam, and entitled to registry under statutes of the United States at the port of its owner's domicile. As a matter of fact, it is registered at the custom house in the city of Wilmington, Delaware. On this the contention is that, that being home, it cannot be taxed elsewhere. There are many cases which hold that such vessel, engaged in commerce between its home port and others, or even wholly between other ports than that of its registry, can be taxed only at the port of registry. It is not our purpose to question these decisions; it is not necessary that we should. They all proceed upon the theory that vessels thus engaged are never in foreign jurisdiction except temporarily, and as an incident to the commerce to which they are devoted, and hence that they do not and cannot acquire a situs in foreign ports for the purposes of taxation. They do not become incorporated with the property of other states and countries, which they touch intermittently, are never indefinitely there, and their business, the work they perform, the uses to which they are put, are not done and performed within, and are not local to, the foreign state or country." And the court concludes: "The question, indeed, is at last one of situs in fact, and, where this is shown, neither foreign registry nor foreign ownership is of any consequence."

Sound reasons exist for the right of the state to tax these vessels that are permanently here transacting local business. They receive the full protection of the local government, and, if mere registry in another port is conclusive against the right to tax here, a boat can operate in our local waters, confined entirely to local business, and, if owned elsewhere, may evade all taxation in this state. Such construction should not be adopted unless imperatively demanded by superior authority. Under the revenue law of this state, personal property is taxed at its situs, and without reference to the residence of the owner.

We have examined the evidence in the record upon the exception made to the findings of the superior court, and fully coincide with the findings. The evidence discloses that for from four to seven years the three tugs have been at Hoquiam, in Chehalis county; that their business has been towing in the waters of Gray's and Willapa harbors in this state; that the corporation plaintiff, for some fifteen years last past, has owned and operated large sawmills, owns large areas of timber lands, and has manufactured from twenty to thirty million feet of lumber annually; that these tugs tow vessels usually from Hoquiam through the harbor to the ocean; that all contracts of towage are made by the captains of the respective tugs, who reside at Hoquiam; that the crews reside there; that the assistant secretary and manager of the company resides there; that all accounts are rendered to him there; that the captains and crews are paid there; and the only absences of the tugs from these harbors shown by the record have been for the purpose of repairs. They appear to have been used for all these years as appurtenant to, and a part of, the lumbering plant and business of the plaintiff in Chehalis county. Upon these facts, we conclude that the situs in fact of the three tugs is in Chehalis county, and that there was a valid assessment levied upon their value.

The objection to the assessment upon the pipe lines and reservoirs has been considered, and we are not inclined to disturb the conclusion of the superior court upon such assessment. We do not think the objection to the right of the officer who made the assessment to his office can be made here. The record shows that he was certainly a de facto assessor, exercising properly all the functions of the office.

The judgment is affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

Charles E. HOGG et al., Exrs., etc., of Henry J. Fisher, Deceased, Pliffs. in Err.,

v.

Anderson C. HARTLEY.

(.....W. Va.....)

*1. A personal judgment upon any cause of action merges and ends that cause of action, and thereafter the statute of limitations runs against the judgment.

2. If a defendant once a resident of the state departs and resides out of it before a personal judgment against him, the time of his residence abroad will not excuse the judgment from the statute of limitations, though he was a resident when the cause of action on which the judgment rests arose or accrued.

3. If before both the birth of the cause of action and the accrual of the right of action a resident of the state removes out of it, his departure and residence abroad will not save the action from the statute of limitations.

(December 1, 1900.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Jackson County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce a judgment which had been recovered by plaintiffs' testator against defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles E. Hogg, for plaintiffs in error:

Statutes providing for the deduction of the time of absence from the state so as to avoid the running of the statute of limitations have been passed in many of the states, and are always construed so as to advance the remedy of the creditor.

Richey v. Sinclair, 167 Ill. 184, 47 N. E. 364; Leeds Lumber Co. v. Haworth, 98 Iowa, nonresidents after cause of action accrues, from benefit of statute of limitations, see Bates v. Cullum (Pa.) 34 L. R. A. 440.

As to interruption of statute by absence from the state generally, see Stanley v. Stanley (Ohio) 8 L. R. A. 333, and note.

The removal of the defendant from the state is of itself an obstruction to the prosecution of the action, and he cannot allege that by such removal he did not obstruct the plaintiff.

Abell v. Pennsylvania Mut. L. Ins. Co. 18 W. Va. 400.

Mr. John H. Riley, for defendant in error:

The statute, so far as it relates to obstructions caused by a defendant's having departed from the state, means that, being a resident when the cause of action accrues against him, and being then suable in the state, the defendant shall not, in computing the time in which he must be sued, have the benefit of any absence caused by his departure after such right of action accrues and before the expiration of the period limited for the beginning of suit.

Embrey v. Jewison, 131 U. S. 336, 33 L. ed. 172, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 776.

It cannot be said that defendant obstructed Fisher in the prosecution of his suit on the original contract and cause of action. The fact that a personal judgment was entered is the answer.

The judgment merged the original contract and cause of action thereon.

Fisher could have sued upon his judgment at any time within the statutory period.

Hale v. Angel, 20 Johns. 342.

The cause of action on which plaintiffs base their action is the judgment rendered in favor of their testator nearly thirteen years before their proceeding was begun, and that long after Hartley ceased to reside in the state. It cannot be said that plaintiffs or their testator have been obstructed in the prosecution of their action by reason of the departure of the defendant.

Walsh v. Schilling, 33 W. Va. 108, 10 S. E. 54.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 12th of August, 1881, Fisher, then in life, recovered a personal judgment against Hartley; and on the 4th day of May, 1894, Hogg and Campbell, executors of Fisher, brought an action of debt in the circuit court of Jackson county upon said judgment against Hartley, and he pleaded the statute of limitations, and to that plea the plaintiffs filed a replication setting up "that, before the right of action in the premises in the declaration alleged accrued to the plaintiffs, the said defendant resided in this state, and resided therein when the liability was contracted upon which the judgment sued on in this action is founded, and that on the — day of —, 1880, the said defendant departed and removed out of said 54 L. R. A.

state, and that the defendant continued to remain and reside out of this state until the — day of —, 1894; and the plaintiffs further say that the defendant returned into this state on the — day of —, 1894, and that the plaintiffs commenced this action on the 4th day of May, 1894, and so, deducting the time the said defendant remained out of this state as aforesaid, the said several causes of action in the declaration mentioned did accrue to the said plaintiffs within ten years next before the commencement of this suit." The court afterwards struck this replication out of the case as presenting no answer to the plea of the statute of limitations, and, judgment having been rendered by the court upon facts agreed in favor of the defendant, Fisher's executors have brought the case to this court.

The case turns entirely upon the question whether the court was right in striking out said special replication. It will be observed that that replication does not state that on the 12th day of August, 1881, Hartley resided in this state, but, on the contrary, it states and admits that he removed out of the state in 1880. This suit is based alone on the judgment, and on it the statute of limitations commenced to run the instant it was rendered. Before that judgment was rendered Hartley had ceased to reside in this state. That replication says that Hartley resided in the state when the liability was contracted upon which the judgment was founded, and thus seeks to introduce as a material element in the case that fact; but it is wholly immaterial. No matter what the cause of action on which that judgment rested, the law is well settled that, whatever that cause of action was, it is merged, closed, and drowned in that personal judgment; for, when a personal judgment is rendered upon any cause of action, that cause cannot be again made the subject of a suit, and the judgment is thereafter the sole test of the rights of the parties.—constitutes a new debt, of the highest dignity, closing the statute of limitations on the original cause of action. Such is the general law. 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 336; Freeman, Judgm. §§ 215-217. By the judgment the debt is "changed into a matter of record and merged in the judgment, and the plaintiff's remedy is upon the latter security while it remains in force." "The original claim has, by being sued upon and merged in the judgment, lost its vitality and expended its force and effect." Black, Judgm. § 674. It is plain, therefore, that the residence in the state of Hartley at the time of the accrual of the original cause of action on which the judgment is based cannot save the plaintiffs from the statute of limitations. To escape the statute of limitations, Hartley must have resided in the state on the date of the judgment, for then this new debt and its right of action arose and accrued: and on that date he was not a resident. That such is the true view (that is, that the date of the judgment is the crucial point as to residence) is further fortified by the consideration that chapter 104 of the Code gives limitations on notes and other causes of personal action, while chapter 139 prescribes limitation to a judgment, showing that when there is a judgment that limitation applies, not the limitation applicable to the original cause of action. Hartley being a nonresident at the time of the birth of the demand and the accrual of the right of action, the exception from the statute of limitations that where the cause of action shall accrue against a person who had before resided in this state, "if such person shall by departing without the same, or by absconding or concealing himself, or by any other indirect ways or means, obstruct the prosecution of such right . . . the time that such obstruction may have continued shall not be computed," cannot save the plaintiffs' demand from the statute of limitations. Walsh v. Schilling, 33 W. Va. 108, 10 S. E. 54, holds that where the defendant, though once a resident of the state, removes out of the state before the accrual or birth of the cause of action, such removal does not bring him within the exception specified in the statute just quoted. So, also, holds Embrey v. Jemison, 131 U. S. 336, 33 L. ed. 172, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 776, construing the Virginia statute precisely the same as ours. So, in effect Heflebover v. Detrick, 27 W. Va. 16. Hartley had removed from the state before the birth of the present cause of action, and before right of action thereon, both being in this case the same instant. The origin and accrual of the cause of action being simultaneous, we need not discuss the conflict of opinion between the cases of Embrey v. Jemison, which holds that, to bring a party within the exception of the statute, he must be a resident of the state at the accrual or maturity of the right of action, and that if a resident at the birth of the cause of action, but not at the accrual or maturity of right of action, he does not come within the exception, and Heflebover v. Detrick, which holds that if a party is a resident at the birth, but removes before the accrual, of the cause of action, he does come within the exception. I think the replication was properly stricken out, as presenting no answer to the plea of the statute.

It is objected that the replication is bad, also, because it does not affirmatively allege that the removal of Hartley from the state did in fact obstruct the prosecution of the plaintiffs' action. I think this is no objection to the replication, because, as held in Cheatham v. Aistrop, 97 Va. 457, 34 S. E. 57, and Picklin v. Carrington, 31 Gratt. 219, the "removal of a judgment debtor from the state is of itself an obstruction to a suit to enforce the judgment, and the statute of limitations does not run against the judgment while the debtor remains out of the state." The statute itself seems to confirm this construction, in the fact that it mentions departure from the state, absconding, and concealing as specific grounds of obstruction of the right of action excusing from the operation of the statute, and then adds "or by any other ways or means obstruct the prosecution of such right," thus plainly intending to say that such departure, absconding, or concealing himself shall per se be regarded as obstruction of the prosecution of action, excusing from the bar of the statute. Therefore we affirm the judgment of the Circuit Court.

v.

(.....W. Va.....)

- *1. While a building association may fix a minimum premium payable in advance or in periodical instalments, such premium must be a lump sum, certain and definite, and not a percentage payable indefinitely at fixed periods.
2. A percentage payable indefinitely at fixed periods is interest, and although it be called "premium," and is in addition to the legal rate of interest already charged, it is usurious, and should be expunged from the account.

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Kanawha County sustaining a demurrer to her bill filed to enjoin the sale of her property for failure to comply with her contract with the defendant association. Reversed.

Messrs. Flournoy, Price, & Smith and Ivory C. Jordan for appellee.

Dent, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

M. L. Gray, on the 10th day of December, 1897, filed her bill in the circuit court of Kanawha county against the Baltimore Building & Loan Association, alleging that she borrowed the sum of $800 from such association on the 8th day of March, 1895, and the association, for the purpose of evading the usury laws, required her, as a mere shift and device, to become the ostensible owner of eight shares of stock in such association, of the par value of $100 each, and to execute a bond and a deed of trust on her property to secure the same. She was also required to pay 50 cents each per month for dues, interest, and premiums per share, and 10 cents per month per share for expense fund, making her monthly payments $18.80, in addition to $1 per share as a preliminary fee. On failure to pay up her dues, interest, and premium, the whole sum was to become due, and her property liable to sale. She paid into the association the sum of $132, and interest to March 30, 1896, and stopped when the association claimed a balance due from her of $930.45, and had her property advertised for sale the 11th day of December, 1897. She prayed an injunction, and that the claim be purged of its usury. The injunction was granted. The defendant appeared and demurred to the bill. The circuit court sustained the demurrer, and dismissed her bill, and thereupon she appealed.

The sole question presented to this court is as to whether the circuit court erred in sustaining such demurrer. The defendant insists that while the bill alleges that the plaintiff was only an ordinary borrower, and the whole transaction was under a building form merely as a device to evade the usury laws, the exhibits filed clearly refute this allegation, and show the bona fides of the transaction as the usual, ordinary building association arrangement, exempted from the operation of the statutes against usury. The association is a corporation of Maryland, doing business through agents in this state, and ordinarily its contracts between itself and stockholders would be subject to the laws of Maryland, at least to the extent they are not repugnant to the laws of this state. It has been held by the court of appeals of Maryland that to exempt building associations from the general usury laws is class legislation, and repugnant to the Constitution of the state, and that the legislature has no such power. Citizens' Security & Land Co. v. Uhler, 48 Md. 455. It was also held in the case cited that "where a shareholder in a corporation executes a mortgage to such corporation to secure a loan, on which he agrees to pay interest at the legal rate weekly during the continuance of the mortgage, and also a premium of twenty-five cents weekly on each of his shares of stock, making in all 9½ per cent interest on the money loaned, such charge is usurious." In this case Mrs. Gray is required to pay 50 cents per month premium, and 50 cents per month interest, making 12 per centum. In the case of Geiger v. Eighth German Bldg. Asso. 58 Md. 569, the same court held that a premium of 30 cents per share, payable weekly, amounting to more than the legal rate of interest, was usurious. In its opinion the court says: "It is not called interest, but is called premium, but it is manifestly intended for interest, and is an invasion of, and in violation of, law." Again: "In this case the word 'premium' and charge for it can only be regarded as meaning interest, and to the extent that the charge exceeds the rate of 6 per centum it cannot be allowed." The conclusion reached is that it is usurious to have the premium take the form of a percentage, payable, as interest is paid, indefinitely, so long as the loan continues; that such method of fixing the premium is but an evasion of the laws against usury, for the purpose of obtaining a greater rate of interest than the legal rate; that the amount of the premium proper should be fixed and determined as a bulk sum at the time of the building or borrowing, and then it can be divided into instalments, to be paid periodically. To fix the premium at the rate of 50 cents per month, payable monthly, for an indefinite period, in addition to the regular rate of interest at the same percentage, is nothing more than doubling the rate of interest.

Since writing the foregoing, I have been furnished the decision of the court of appeals of Maryland in the case of White v. Williams, 90 Md. 719, 45 Atl. 1001, assignee of this same defendant, holding that prior to chapter 321 of the Acts of the Legislature of Maryland of 1894, in effect April 6, 1894, to fix the premium in shape of percentage, was usurious; thus adhering to the case of Geiger v. Eighth German Bldg. Asso. cited. The court did not pass on the effect the act would have on cases arising after its passage, although an inference might be drawn from the opinion that after the passage of the act the premium could be fixed in the shape of a percentage. The language of the act, as quoted, is that "instead of receiving the whole amount of said premium in advance, or deducting the whole amount of said premium," the building association may receive the same in weekly, monthly, or such other instalments as may be agreed upon. But it does not follow that the premium may take the form of a percentage, payable indefinitely, nor does it preclude the idea that the premium must be first fixed in amount by the by-laws, and then be divided into periodical instalments. In Endlich, Bldg. Asso. (§ 407) it is said: "The statutes authorizing the reservation of premiums have in general been understood to mean a definite sum for the whole period of the loan, and not anything whatever that the parties in their contract may choose to denominate a bonus or premium." In Thompson, Bldg. Asso. (p. 104) it is said: "The legislative intention in allowing premiums was to confer on the association an equitable and profitable method of selecting its borrowers by requiring of them a bonus. So, if the association disregards this intention, and by any form increases the interest, the courts promptly restrain any such practice, and compel it to refund any such overcharge." The premium in this case seems to be fixed, not for the purpose of providing a bonus, but merely as a subterfuge to double the rate of interest. It having been held that the loans of the defendant prior to the 6th of April, 1894, were usurious, and such holding destroying the mutuality of the association, it would be inequitable to require this plaintiff to abide by her contract, and pay this percentage premium, although it should be determined not to be usurious under the latter enactment.

It is eminently proper in this case that the laws of Maryland should prevail, as they are in no wise repugnant to the laws of this state, and all borrowers and shareholders of such association should be placed on the same footing, and only required to settle with the association on the same basis. Nor could a different conclusion be reached under the statutes of this state. Section 26, chap. 54, Code, provides that "every such association shall have the power to provide by its by-laws for selling to the stockholders who shall bid the highest premium therefor the money in the treasury, or in default of bidders at or above a minimum premium may award to a member the value of any shares held by him less such minimum premium, the minimum premium and the mode of making the award to be fixed by the by-laws. Or such association may charge and receive the premium bid by a stockholder for the priority of right to such loans in periodical instalments, but the by-laws of every association shall set forth whether the premium bid for the prior right to a loan shall be deducted therefrom in advance, or be paid in periodical instalments." This provision does not authorize the minimum premium to be fixed at a percentage on the amount borrowed, to be paid during an indefinite period; for such would be nothing more than increasing the rate of interest from 6 to 12 per centum. But the law requires that the premium should be fixed at a lump sum, commonly known as a "bonus," and then it may be deducted in advance from the principal or paid in periodical instalments. For instance, if such premium is fixed at $10 on the $100, it can be deducted or be divided into ten equal annual instalments of $1 each, or 100 equal monthly instalments of 10 cents each. Thus, the borrower knows just what premium is required of him. But where the premium is an increased interest percentage, indefinite in time, he is at the mercy of the association, and may be required to pay the same until his dues alone are sufficient to cancel the loan. In the present case, although Mrs. Gray had paid in $132, she only receives credit for the amount of her dues as of the time of their payment, to wit, $44, being the one third thereof, the other two thirds being retained by the association as though it were interest, and not to be accounted for; and in addition she is charged the further sum of $184.40 for the further time elapsed, composed of $84 interest, $84 premium, and $8.40 fines, for which she gets no credit on her indebtedness, but it all goes into the earnings of the association, from which she is allowed no dividend; thus being denied the right of a shareholder or participant in the social funds. One of the main justifications for building associations is the fact that the earnings are social assets, to be divided among the membership, so that, while a borrowing member is required to pay interest, premium, and fines, a large portion, being an equal share thereof, is returned to him in the shape of dividends. Mrs. Gray, receiving no dividends, makes out a prima facie case of usury, without regard to the manner of the payment of the premium. The prospectus of the association filed herein as its by-laws provides for the quarterly division of the profits, and, although Mrs. Gray was a member in good standing for about four quarters, she was not allowed any share in such quarterly division. Why this omission the bill does not disclose. The presumption is, in the absence of other explanation, that she was treated merely as a borrower, and not as a shareholder. Being such, she has paid or been charged with 12 per centum interest per annum, payable in monthly payments; which, without further explanation, renders the loan usurious, and the demurrer to the bill should have been overruled. In the case of Archer against this same association (45 W. Va. 37, 30 S. E. 241), this court held that "building associations are authorized to adopt by-laws fixing a minimum premium at which to award loans to their members, such premiums to be deducted from the loans in advance or paid in periodical instalments." This is merely declarative of the statute, and does not in any wise conflict therewith. In the opinion I sought to hold that the premium could only be charged once, and that Mrs. Archer could not be required to pay the monthly premiums assessed. My associates were of a different opinion, and held her bound for such payments. The question did not then present itself in the exact form that it does in the present case, or the court would have probably viewed it in the same light.

The question, then, being whether the association had the right to fix a minimum premium to be paid in instalments, the answer was in the affirmative. The present question is, Has the association the right to fix a minimum premium at a certain percentage on the amount borrowed, payable indefinitely at fixed periods? In other words, under the name of "premium," to increase the rate of interest? If such is the case, the association could not be guilty of taking usury, it matters not how high its rate of interest might be fixed, so the word "premium" is substituted for the word "interest." To demand 12 per centum interest would be usury, but to demand 6 per cent interest and 6 per cent premium would not be usury. Such an evasion is too transparent to escape condemnation, and cannot for a moment be upheld. And if there is any language in the Archer Case that leads to such a conclusion it is disapproved. A minimum premium may be fixed under the law, but it must be a lump sum, certain and definite, which may be paid in advance or in periodical instalments. Under the pretense of fixing such premium, the legal rate of interest may not be increased indefinitely. To allow such to be the law would permit the association to charge Mrs. Gray both premium and interest until her payment of dues canceled her indebtedness, when she would have paid into the association for the use of $800 three times that amount, or $2,400, while denied the right to participate in the profits otherwise dissipated. Such a contract is usurious and unconscionable.

The decree is reversed, and the demurrer to the bill overruled, and the cause remanded.

Rehearing denied.

Charles B. WILLIAMS'S ADMINISTRATOR.

1. A sheriff is liable on his bond for the killing by a deputy of a third person under the mistaken belief that he is one for whose arrest on a charge of felony he has a warrant, and that the killing is necessary to prevent his escape, where the statute provides that the sheriff shall be liable on his bond for any misconduct or default of his deputies.
2. Punitive damages cannot be awarded against a sheriff's bond for the wrongful act of the sheriff's deputy in killing a third person under the mistaken belief that he is a felon for whose arrest the deputy has a warrant, and that the killing is necessary to prevent his escape.

(June 14, 1901.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hickman County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to hold the defendant sheriff liable on his bond for the wrongful act of his deputy in killing plaintiff's intestate while attempting to prevent his escape from arrest under a warrant which they held against a third person. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. C. Flourney, Robertson & Thomas, and R. T. Tyler for appellants.

Messrs. John W. Ray and Shelbourne & Kane for appellee.

Paynter, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was instituted by the appellee against the appellant T. H. Johnson, sheriff, and the sureties in his bond, for the alleged negligent killing of the intestate, Charles Williams, by two of his deputies. Dave Browder murdered a negro. Ernest Johnson and H. C. Judge were deputies under Johnson, and were sent to arrest him for the crime which he had committed. They went to Casye, a small village, where Browder seems to have lived, with the view of accomplishing his arrest. It was there ascertained that he had gone to Moscow, a near-by village, to see his father, as he said he would not surrender until he had a consultation with him. It was thought probable that he would return to Casye. So the parties started in the night-time, with the view of apprehending him. Johnson and Judge went to a point where the Moscow road crosses another one. Shortly after reaching that crossing two men were discovered approaching in a buggy, leading behind them a gray horse. The deputies had been informed that Browder was riding a gray horse, and they also claim that they thought they recognized the voice of one of the parties as being his. The deputies claim they halted them as they approached, and, instead of stopping the speed of the horse, they increased it, and after the buggy had passed them they fired, with the intention of preventing Browder's escape. It turned out that he was not in the buggy, but a young man by the name of Campbell, and with him was Charles Williams. One shot took effect in Williams's head, from which he shortly thereafter died. Campbell testified that as soon as the deputy sheriffs cried "Halt" he hollowed "Whoa" to his mare, and about that time the deputies began to fire on them. There is also some testimony tending to show that the ball which killed Williams entered his forehead. The whole defense is based upon the idea that the deputy sheriffs had the right, if it was necessary to do so to prevent Browder's escape, to kill him; that, as they had probable cause for believing that he was one of the occupants of the buggy, they therefore had the right to shoot, and, if in doing so they killed Williams, there is no more liability than there would have been had Browder been killed. The case was tried, at the instance of the defendants, upon the theory that they had the right to kill Browder under the circumstances detailed by them, and that there is no more liability created for the killing of Williams than there would have been had they killed Browder. It is not denied that the deputies were acting virtute officii, as the defendants sought to escape liability upon the grounds that they were so acting, and that they had acted properly. It is not claimed that the killing was colore officii. In the court below both the plaintiff and defendants endeavored to try, and did try, the case upon the theory that an officer has the right to shoot one charged with felony, to prevent his escape.

The opinions of courts and the writers upon criminal law recognize the rule to be that an officer has the right to shoot one charged with a felony, to prevent him from escaping. It was so held by this court in Head v. Martin, 85 Ky. 480, 3 S. W. 622. But we do not decide whether or not the deputies would have been authorized, in law, to have shot Browder, had he been in the buggy, attempting to prevent arrest by fleeing. Whether fleeing under such circumstances is such an escape, in the meaning of the law, as would authorize officers who have a warrant of arrest for one on a charge of felony to shoot him, we do not decide. Courts recognize the rule to be that if a process is put in the hands of an officer to execute against B., and he seizes the goods of A. under it, he is liable on his official bond to A. for damages. Norwalk ex rel. Faucett v. Ireland, 68 Conn. 1, 35 Atl. 804; People ex rel. Norris v. Mercereau, 74 Mich. 689, 42 N. W. 153; Walter v. Jacobson, 7 N. D. 32, 73 N. W. 65. It was held in Lammon v. Feuster, 111 U. S. 17, 28 L. ed. 337, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 286, that the taking by a marshal of the United States, upon a writ of attachment against one person, of the goods of another, is a breach of the condition of his official bond, for which his sureties are liable. It has been held that an illegal arrest is a breach of a bond to faithfully and without oppression discharge all duties required by law. Yount v. Carney, 91 Iowa, 550, 60 N. W. 114. It was held in West v. Cabell, 153 U. S. 78, 38 L. ed. 643, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 752, that a warrant to arrest James West for murder will not authorize the marshal to arrest Vandy M. West, and for the arrest and imprisonment of the latter on such warrant by one of his deputies the marshal and his sureties are liable upon his official bond. Murrefe, Sheriff, § 60, says: "On the common-law principles governing the ordinary relations of principal and agent, a sheriff would not be responsible for an act done by his deputy colore officii, but it is held in Virginia and West Virginia that on principles of public policy, applying to the relation of a sheriff and his deputy, the former is liable in such a case; and, on the same principle, it would seem that he and his sureties are liable on his official bond. In a Massachusetts case (Knockton v. Bartlett, 1 Pick. 273) the court says: 'If the act from which the injury resulted was an official act, the authorities are clear that the sheriff is answerable. If it was not an official, but a personal, act, it is equally clear that he is not answerable. But an official act does not mean what a deputy might lawfully do in the execution of his office. If so, no action could ever lie against the sheriff for the misconduct of his deputy. It means, therefore, whatever is done under color or by virtue of his office.' To hold the deputy and his sureties liable to the sheriff on his bond, it is not necessary that the deputy should be acting under color of some writ, but if he is acting under color of his office, and professing so to act, and inducing others interested to believe he is acting colore officii, he and his sureties will be bound by such acts. No other rule would be safe. Sureties are not needed on a sheriff's bond, if they are only to be held when he acts legally. They vouch for his acts, and bind themselves to make good any damage he may cause to anyone while acting under color of his office. And, if the sheriff and his sureties are bound for such acts of the deputy while acting under color of his office, then the deputy and his sureties are liable to the sheriff for his act." In Brown v. Weaver, 76 Miss. 7, 42 L. R. A. 423, 23 So. 388, it was held that an officer had no right to shoot a misdemeanor to prevent his escape, and that if he was unjustifiably shot by a deputy sheriff in attempting to arrest him under a warrant, or in attempting to prevent his escape after arrest, he can maintain an action for damages on the official bond of the deputy's principal. In Head v. Martin the court held that an officer had no right to shoot one charged with a misdemeanor, while escaping. It does not appear from the opinion what was the purpose of the action, but, as it was not a criminal prosecution, it must have been an action for damages. This court, in Shields v. Pfanz, 101 Ky. 407, 41 S. W. 267, held that a sheriff was responsible for the mistreatment of the prisoner by his deputy while conveying him from one county to another.

The covenants of the sheriff's bond required him to faithfully discharge the duties of his office. This imposes the duty of executing the processes which the law authorizes to be issued and placed in his hands, and to make arrests in the manner and upon the conditions imposed by law. If he attempts to make an arrest, and in doing so inflicts an injury in violation of law upon the party sought to be arrested, or upon another, then he and his sureties are liable for the damages sustained. If the sheriff, in executing an order of attachment against the property of one person, seizes that of another, he and his sureties are liable. If he should seize the property of one not a defendant in the execution, and sell it to satisfy it, he is liable on his bond for the tort. If he has a warrant against one, and under it arrests another, he is liable on his bond for the tort thus committed. He cannot justify the wrongful arrest by showing he believed, and had reasonable grounds for believing, that he was executing it upon the party named in it. If he cannot in that way justify a wrongful arrest, much less should he be permitted to justify the killing of another by showing that he had probable cause for believing that he was shooting at the party whom he was authorized to arrest. The law which gives an officer the right to kill an escaping felon certainly requires him to know that it is the felon, not an innocent party, whose life he is attempting to take. The question here is quite a different one from what we would have if the deputy sheriffs had shot at Browder while escaping, and killed Williams. In the latter case they would have been shooting at the right man, if the facts justified it, but here they shot at and killed an innocent man. While they did an unlawful act, still they were acting in their official capacity. They had the authority as deputy sheriffs to arrest Browder, but in the exercise of that authority they acted improperly, abusing the confidence which the law imposed in them. They were guilty of misconduct in office, for which their principal and his sureties are liable; for § 4141, Ky. Stat., provides: "The sheriff may, with the approval of the county court, appoint one or more deputies, and take bond to himself for the faithful discharge of the duties of such deputies; but in all cases the sheriff shall be liable on his bond or bonds for any misconduct or default of such deputies; any deputy may be removed at any time by the sheriff."

The instructions which the court gave were more favorable to the defendants than they were entitled to have given to the jury, except the one on the measure of damages. The part of the instruction giving the measure of compensatory damages is substantially correct, but the instruction also authorized the jury to award punitive damages. Punitive damages might have been awarded against the deputies who killed the decedent, but it is not proper that they should be given against the sheriff and the sureties in his official bond. The covenants of the bond do not require the sureties to do more than compensate an injured party for the actual damages which he may have sustained by reason of the misconduct of the sheriff or his deputies. Its covenants do not require them to pay a sum of money which is inflicted by way of punishment.

They have committed no wrong, and therefore the reason of the law which allows exemplary damages against wrongdoers cannot make it apply to them. In fact, the reasons which allow a recovery of exemplary damages would forbid their assessment against sureties in the official bond. This is an action upon contract. Usually exemplary damages are allowed only in actions of tort. It has been held in some cases that where the condition of the bond given in pursuance of the statute is broken by the commission of a tort, such as would be a proper cause for exemplary damages, such damages may be recovered in the action on the bond. But it is stated in Sedgw. Damages, § 370, that "this is contrary, however, to the current of authority, which is to the effect that only compensatory damages can be recovered in an action on a statutory bond." While the court should not have given an instruction awarding exemplary damages, still the verdict was only $2,500. Considering the evidence as to the age and health of the young man who was killed, the jury could not have included in their verdict any exemplary damages.

The judgment is affirmed.

Burnam, J., dissenting:

In my opinion, the act of the deputies in killing decedent was not in discharge of an official duty; hence the securities on the sheriff's bond cannot be made liable under the facts of this case, and I therefore dissent from this opinion.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

(46 C. C. A. 11, 106 Fed. 866.)

The voluntary conveyance by an insolvent, for the use of his wife, without actual fraud, of all his real estate, the value of which is not greater than is subject by law to a homestead exemption during the life of himself and wife and the minority of his children, will not deprive him of the right to have the homestead set off to him in a bankruptcy proceeding, in case he obtains a reconveyance after the adjudication of his bankruptcy, and includes the land in his schedule of property.

(March 5, 1901.)

PETITION to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit to revise the action of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Tennessee refusing to allow a homestead exemption of a bankrupt's property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—For the effect of a fraudulent conveyance upon a right to homestead, see also Stern v. Lee (N. C.) 26 L. R. A. 814, and Kennedy v. First Nat. Bank (Ala.) 36 L. R. A. 308. 54 L. R. A.

Argued before Lurton, Day, and Severens, Circuit Judges.

Mr. Harvey Terry for petitioner.

Mr. J. V. Lee opposed.

Lurton, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner, a voluntary bankrupt, seeks to review the order of the district court denying him a homestead in land set out in his schedule as an asset. 105 Fed. 425. He is a citizen and resident of Tennessee, and is the head of a family. For many years he owned and occupied a small farm, valued at $1,000, which he claimed and held as a homestead under the homestead law of the state. This was the only land owned or claimed by him at the time of his bankruptcy. Within four months prior to his adjudication as a bankrupt he conveyed this land by a deed, in which his wife joined, to one Taylor, for the recited consideration of $500, but remained in possession. Shortly after his bankruptcy, and before examination, Taylor reconveyed same to petitioner, who thereupon applied for and obtained leave to amend his schedule, and include this land as an asset, and to claim a homestead therein. The referee denied this claim, and on request certified the question to the district judge, together with an agreed statement of the facts and his own finding. Upon this record the district judge affirmed the order of the referee. The ground upon which the right of homestead was denied was that under the Tennessee decisions a debtor was not entitled to a homestead in property recovered by his creditors which had been fraudulently conveyed by him, and that the reconveyance procured by the bankrupt after he had been adjudicated a bankrupt accomplished no more than would have resulted from a suit by the trustee in bankruptcy. The findings of the referee and the opinion of the district judge are reported in 105 Fed. 425, 427. The Tennessee Constitution (art. 11, § 11) provides that "a homestead in the possession of each head of a family and the improvements thereon, to the value, in all, of $1,000, shall be exempt from sale, under legal process, during the life of such head of a family to inure to the benefit of the widow, and shall be exempted during the minority of their children occupying the same. Nor shall said property be alienated without the joint consent of husband and wife, when that relation exists."

The homestead estate or interest is but an estate carved out of the fee for the life of the debtor, his widow, and his children during their minority. The homestead interest is the estate which is exempted from sale under legal process, and which can be conveyed only by the joint conveyance of husband and wife, where that relation exists. The remainder interest, subject to this homestead estate, is subject to sale by legal process to pay the debts of the owner of the fee. Platt v. Stadler, 16 Lea, 371; Hovell v. Jones, 91 Tenn. 403, 19 S. W. 757. The only land which the petitioner owned was the land in which he now claims a homestead. Inasmuch as its value did not exceed $1,000, no formal assignment of homestead in it was necessary. The homestead right attached to and covered the whole land and its improvements. Briscoe v. Vaughn, 103 Tenn. 308, 52 S. W. 1068. Neither does the right of homestead depend upon occupancy since the Tennessee act of 1879, for it constitutes, when assigned, a vested life estate, which passes under the deed of the owner in the same manner as any other life estate. Acts 1879, chap. 171 (Shannon's [Tenn.] Code, §§ 3798, 3800); Cowan v. Carson, 101 Tenn. 523, 50 S. W. 742; Briscoe v. Vaughn, 103 Tenn. 308, 52 S. W. 1068. The only interest which was subject to the creditors of the petitioner was the remainder interest in the land in which he now asks a homestead. If the homestead estate was not subject to creditors, it is difficult to see how a conveyance limited to that estate could be fraudulent as to creditors. Leslie v. Joyner, 2 Head, 514. A voluntary conveyance of a homestead neither hinders nor prejudices creditors, and, whatever the motive of the grantor, creditors are not wronged, inasmuch as it was not subject to either legal or equitable process in their favor. Thomson v.

Crane, 73 Fed. 327; Fellows v. Lewis, 65 Ala. 343, 354, 30 Am. Rep. 1. The difficulty is that the petitioner conveyed the entire fee, thereby including the remainder interest, which was subject to creditors. But does it follow that, because exempt and nonexempt property are joined in one conveyance, the creditors' rights are enlarged if the conveyance was a voluntary one? How a homestead may be acquired or lost must depend upon the law of the state under which the right of homestead arises. That law, as construed and applied by the highest court of Tennessee, constitutes a rule of property binding upon the Federal courts in respect to homestead rights claimed in that state. Brashear v. West, 7 Pet. 608, 8 L. ed. 801; Allen v. Massey, 17 Wall. 351, 21 L. ed. 542; First Nat. Bank v. Glass, 25 C. C. A. 151, 49 U. S. App. 228, 79 Fed. 706.

What, then, is the effect upon a debtor's right of homestead if he fraudulently convey the property in which he claims it? In Cowan v. Johnson, 2 Tenn. Cas. 41, it was held that, where the husband and wife joined in the execution of a conveyance which was fraudulent in fact, neither could claim a homestead in the property so conveyed when their deed had been set aside by creditors. In Ruohs v. Hooke, 3 Lea, 302, 31 Am. Rep. 642, a transfer of a house and lot, occupied by the debtor, to his wife, based upon love and affection, was held void as to existing creditors, because the husband had not retained property sufficient to provide for his existing liabilities. But upon application by the wife homestead was assigned in the property so recovered. Cowan v. Johnson was distinguished upon the ground that both husband and wife had participated in a conveyance which was fraudulent in fact. The case is a distinct authority for holding that the right of the wife to claim a homestead in property subject to the right of homestead is not forfeited when conveyed by the husband to the wife by a deed which is only constructively fraudulent. In Nichol v. Davidson County, 8 Lea, 389, a conveyance by the husband to his wife was set aside for fraud, and the wife denied a homestead. The case was rested upon Cowan v. Johnson. The latest Tennessee case dealing with this subject is that of Rosenbaum v. Davis, decided since the decision in the court below, and reported in 106 Tenn. 51, 60 S. W. 497. There a conveyance by the husband to the wife was set aside by creditors as fraudulent in law. The wife was held not to be estopped by her acceptance of the deed, and was allowed homestead out of the property recovered from her by the creditors. The preceding cases were fully reviewed by Judge McAlister, and the conclusion reached that the wife's right of homestead is not lost when the conveyance is not fraudulent in fact. It is a matter of no importance whether the application for a homestead came from the petitioner, or his wife, or both. The homestead is for the joint benefit of husband, wife, and minor children. The wife's application, as would that of the husband, inures to the use of all. In Himes v. Smith, 2 Tenn. Cas. 431, a homestead was allowed upon the husband's application against his own deed, his wife not having joined therein. A valid joint conveyance by husband and wife, or a joint participation in a conveyance fraudulent in fact, is necessary to convey or forfeit the homestead right. In both Ruohs v. Hooke and Rosenbaum v. Davis, cited above, the husband was grantor and the wife grantee; yet the wife's application for homestead was not denied, though she was a party to the conveyance which had been set aside as constructively fraudulent. The estoppel in those cases was no stronger against the husband than the wife. What the one gave, without moral fraud, the other had accepted. The test is, Was the conveyance in which husband and wife participated, either as joint grantors or as grantor and grantee, free from actual, wicked fraud? If so, the homestead right may be asserted in property thus conveyed as against the claims of creditors affected thereby. If, on the other hand, the transaction is tainted with purposed fraud, the right of homestead is lost when both husband and wife participate. This forfeiture of the homestead right in cases of actual fraud is said in Gibbs v. Patten, 2 Lea, 180-183, to be a rule founded on ethics, "in that it visits fraud, with severe penalties."

This brings us to the question as to the actual character of the conveyance made by the petitioner and his wife of the property in which the petitioner now asserts a right of homestead. That this review of the order of the district judge extends only to questions of law must be conceded. If the facts have been settled by the district judge, we cannot go behind his finding of fact. There was a finding of fact and law by the referee, but the order of the referee was not reviewed upon this finding of facts nor upon the referee's summary of the evidence. The referee certified the entire evidence as an agreed statement of facts, and the district judge reviewed the referee's order upon the entire evidence heard by the referee. In this state of the record the finding of facts or opinion of the referee upon the facts is of no evidential value. The hearing by the district judge was an original hearing upon all of the evidence. But it has been argued that the learned district judge found that the deed to Taylor was fraudulent, and that this finding is conclusive. But the learned district judge did not find that the transaction was fraudulent in fact. Having well in mind the distinction between constructive and actual fraud, he stopped with a finding that the conveyance was "fraudulent in law." Referring to his opinion, which constitutes the only finding made by him, he said upon this subject that, "upon the evidence disclosed by the record, there can be no doubt that the conveyance made by the bankrupt of the land in which the homestead is now claimed was fraudulent; certainly so in law, whatever might be considered true as a matter of fact." In the absence of a specific finding of the fact of actual as distinguished from constructive fraud, we can only conclude that the order of the referee was confirmed upon the ground that the conveyance was constructively fraudulent, and that under the Tennessee decisions the bankrupt forfeited his right of homestead by a conveyance constructively fraudulent if the wife joined therein. That the learned judge did not mean to be understood as finding fraud in fact is very obvious from the agreed statement of facts, which constituted the whole of the evidence. The only evidence consisted in that given by the bankrupt himself when examined at a creditors' meeting. The sum of it is this: Acting under bad legal advice, he assumed that this entire tract of land, being only of the value of $1,000, was exempt, and could be conveyed at his pleasure, without wrong to his existing creditors. He wished to convey it to his wife, but, being advised that he could not do so directly, he conveyed to Taylor, who was closely related to his wife, with the purpose and in trust that Taylor would convey it to his wife. Two months afterwards he applied to be declared a bankrupt, and omitted this property from his schedule. Later on, and before he had been examined, or any step taken to reach this property, he was advised that the creditors had a right to the remainder interest in his homestead. Thereupon he procured Taylor to reconvey to him, applied for and obtained leave to amend his schedule by adding this property as an asset in which he claimed a homestead. That the conveyance of the remainder estate was voluntary and void as to creditors because he was at the time indebted to insolvency, is plain. But that his purpose was to cheat, defraud, or hinder his creditors is not the inference which the district judge drew from this evidence. So far as the conveyance was in contravention of the rights of his creditors, he has rectified matters by procuring a reconveyance. This he did in advance of any action by creditors or in their behalf. But, assuming that he has thereby accomplished what an action by the trustee would have accomplished, and that his rights are not other or greater than if the trustee had set the deed aside, we nevertheless reach the conclusion that the transaction was free from moral fraud, and was only constructively fraudulent. The case is therefore governed by the milder and more just rule announced in Ruohs v. Hooke and Rosenbaum v. Davis, cited above.

The order denying homestead was erroneous. It will be set aside, and the property sold, subject to the homestead rights of the petitioner as herein indicated. The trustee will pay the costs of this proceeding out of the bankrupt's estate.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THIRD CIRCUIT.

LIFE INSURANCE CLEARING COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

O'NEILL.

(45 C. C. A. 641, 106 Fed. 800.)

1. An adult son has not, from the bare fact of relationship, an insurable interest in the life of his father.
2. The existence of a law imposing upon a son the duty of supporting his father in case the latter becomes unable to support himself gives the son no insurable interest in the father's life, in the absence of any expenditures, past or prospective, towards such support.
3. Ability on the part of the father to support his adult son in case of the latter's inability to support himself is necessary to give the son an insurable interest in the father's life, under a statute imposing upon fathers the duty of caring for their indigent children.

1. The rule that pecuniary interest is necessary.
 - a. Its origin and extent.

The rule was formerly a general one, and still exists to some extent and in some jurisdictions, that a pecuniary interest of some kind on the part of the assured in the life of the insured is necessary to support insurance upon the life of the latter in favor of the former, and that mere consanguinity or blood relationship is not sufficient, however close it may be, without such pecuniary interest. This rule seems to have originated in, or at least to have been largely based upon, Halford v. Kymer, 10 Barn. & C. 724, in which it was held that, to render a policy of insurance upon the life of another valid, within the meaning of 14 Geo. III., chap. 48, § 1, providing that no insurance shall be made on lives or any other event wherein the person for whose benefit the policy shall be made shall have no interest, and that every such insurance shall be void, and § 8 thereof, providing that in all cases where the insured has interest in such life or event no greater sum shall be recovered or received from the insurers than the amount or value of the interest of the insured in such life or other event, the party for whose benefit it is effected must have a pecuniary interest in the life or event insured, 54 L. R. A.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of life insurance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Dallas and Gray, Circuit Judges, and McPherson, District Judge.Mr. J. F. Kyle for plaintiff in error.Mr. James Scarlett for defendant in error.J. B. McPherson, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on a policy of insurance taken out and maintained by an adult son for his own benefit upon the life of his father, and the question for decision is whether, under the facts in evidence, the son had an insurable interest sufficient to support the policy. The learned trial judge held that such interest existed, relying mainly upon Reserve Mut. Ins. Co. v. Kane, 81 Pa. 154, and a policy effected by a father in his own name on the life of his son is void for want of such pecuniary interest.

14 Geo. III., chap. 48, however, never became a part of the jurisprudence of the United States; but, notwithstanding this fact, a number of the courts of the United States have adopted, and some have clung to, the rule requiring a pecuniary interest to support insurance upon the life of another.

Under that rule relationship is of little importance in determining the existence of an insurable interest upon the part of one party in the life of another, except as tending to give rise to circumstances which justify a well-founded expectation of pecuniary advantage from the continuance of the life insured, or risk of loss from its termination. Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Hogan, 80 Ill. 35, 22 Am. Rep. 180.

Thus, the mere relation of father and son, when both parties are of mature years and live apart in independent pecuniary circumstances, and are mutually entirely independent of each other, and have no business relations with each other, does not create an insurable interest upon the part of the son in the life of the father. Ibid.; Chicago Guaranty Fund Life Soc. v. Dyon, 79 Ill. App. 100; Mitchell v. Union L. Ins. Co. 45 Me. 104, 71 Am. Dec. 529.

Unless the son had a well-founded or reasonable expectation of some pecuniary advantage to be derived from the continuance of the life of the father. Chicago Guaranty Fund Life Soc. v. Dyon, 79 Ill. App. 100.

And a daughter has not an insurable interest in the life of her mother which will sustain insurance upon the mother's life for the benefit of the daughter, so as to warrant a decree of specific performance of an alleged agreement by an insurance company to issue such a policy. Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Volger, 89 Ind. 572, 48 Am. Rep. 185; Prudential Ins. Co. v. Hunn, 21 Ind. App. 522, 52 N. E. 772.

And a complaint in an action for specific performance of an agreement by an insurance company to issue a paid-up policy to a daughter for her own benefit upon the life of her mother falls within the rule which requires complaints in actions on insurance policies to aver an insurable interest in the plaintiff in the life in-

22 Am. Rep. 741, but evidently deciding the point with some reluctance. His opinion upon this subject is as follows: "The second question is, Had the plaintiff an insurable interest in the life of his father? We have examined with much care the authorities and text-books on this subject. We find them conflicting to such an extent as to support a judgment on this reserved point for either the plaintiff or defendant. The supreme court of Pennsylvania in Reserve Mut. Ins. Co. v. Kane, 81 Pa. 154, 22 Am. Rep. 741, held an adult son had an insurable interest in the life of his father. While the Federal courts are not bound by the state courts' construction of a contract of insurance (Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 16 Pet. 495, 10 L. ed. 1044; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 443, 32 L. ed. 788, 9 Sup. Ct.

Rep. 469), yet, in view of the general conflict of decisions on this question, the fact that a state statute was an element in the conclusion reached by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and that a decision holding the son had not an insurable interest might unsettle the status of policies in this state, we are moved, sitting at circuit, to hold, for the purposes of this case, the plaintiff had an insurable interest in the life of his father, leaving it to the circuit court of appeals to settle the question."

The uncontradicted evidence established the facts that the son was an adult, married, and having a home and family of his own apart from his father; that he was not supported by, and did not support, his father, but that each maintained himself by his own exertions. There is nothing to show that the relation of debtor and creditor existed sured. Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Volger, 89 Ind. 572, 46 Am. Rep. 185.

So, the mere relationship of brother to brother is not such an interest as will support a policy of life insurance obtained by one upon the life of the other. The interest required to make such a contract valid must be of a pecuniary nature. Lewis v. Phenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 39 Conn. 104.

And a mother suing upon a policy issued upon the life of her son cannot be permitted to claim that the complaint declares upon a policy issued to her as his mother, and also that it declares upon a policy issued to him upon his own life. Prudential Ins. Co. v. Hunn, 21 Ind. App. 525, 52 N. E. 772.

So, in Helmetag v. Miller, 76 Ala. 183, 52 Am. Rep. 316, it was said that it has been held in some cases that the interest in the life of another which will support insurance thereon must be in some sense a pecuniary one, not predicated merely upon the fact of existing relationship; but in other cases the contrary view has been intimated, which does not, however, seem to be sustained by the weight of authority.

And in Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Volger, 89 Ind. 572, 46 Am. Rep. 185, it was said that an insurable interest in the life of another must be a pecuniary interest. Some of the authorities tend in the direction that mere relationship, as between parent and child, is a sufficient foundation upon which to rest an insurable interest; but this view is not sustained by the weight of authority.

But the statute of 14 Geo. III., chap. 48, prohibiting wager policies, is a defense to an insurance company only if they choose to avail themselves of it. If they do not, the question, Who is entitled to the money? must be determined as if the statute did not exist; and where a father effects insurance in the name of, and on the life of, his son, in which he has no insurable interest, intending it for his own benefit, and the son dies intestate, and the father takes out administration on his estate, and the insurance company pays the money assured by the policy to him, although as between him and the company the policy is illegal and void under that statute, yet, as between the father and the estate of the son, the father is entitled to retain the money for his own benefit. Worthington v. Curtis, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 419, 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. 259, 33 L. T. N. S. 828, 24 Week. Rep. 228.

b. What pecuniary interest is sufficient.

The general rule is that when insurable interest arises or is implied from relationship it will be deemed to exist when the relationship is such that the insurer has a legal claim upon the insured for service or support, or where, from their personal relations and the kindness and good feeling displayed by the insured to the assured, the latter has a reasonable right to expect some pecuniary advantage from the continuance of the life of the former, or to fear loss from his death. Rombach v. Piedmont & A. L. Ins. Co. 35 La. Ann. 233, 48 Am. Rep. 239.

In the above case it was said that the statement in Phenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Bailey, 13 Wall. 616, 20 L. ed. 501, which was a case of insurance upon the life of a husband for the benefit of his wife, that it is sufficient to show that a policy is not invalid as a wager policy if it appears that the relation of consanguinity or affinity is such as to warrant the conclusion that the beneficiary has an interest, whether pecuniary or arising from dependence, or from natural affection, in the life of the person assured,—was a mere dictum of Clifford, J., and not in accord with the decisions generally.

Thus, a father is entitled to the earnings of his minor child, and may maintain an action for their recovery, and has a pecuniary interest in its life which the law will protect and enforce, and which will uphold a policy of insurance taken out upon such life for his benefit. Mitchell v. Union L. Ins. Co. 45 Me. 104, 71 Am. Dec. 529; Grattan v. National L. Ins. Co. 15 Hun, 74; O'Rourke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 10 Misc. 405, 31 N. Y. Supp. 130.

And after his majority the son, in case of indigence of his father, may be compelled to aid in his support and maintenance. Grattan v. National L. Ins. Co. 15 Hun, 74.

And this interest is sufficient to take the policy out of the class of wager contracts, and thus to give it validity. O'Rourke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 10 Misc. 405, 31 N. Y. Supp. 130.

So, where a father purchased a contingent legacy of his son which was bequeathed to him if he should attain thirty years of age, and, when the son wanted twenty months of that age, took out insurance upon his life for two years of his life upon an annual premium calculated without reference to the legacy, and after the son attained the age of thirty and the father received the legacy the son died before the expiration of the two years, it was held to be a question for the jury whether, by insuring for two years, when the father had an insurable interest for twenty months only, a fraud upon the statute prohibiting wager policies was intended. Lau v. London Indisputable Life Policy Co. 1 Kay & J. 223, 1 Jur. N. S. 178, 3 Eq. Rep. 338, 24 L. J. Ch. N. S. 196.

And where in such case the father was told between them. It will be observed, therefore, that the precise question is—laying aside, for the present, the effect of the poor law of Pennsylvania—whether the bare fact of relationship is sufficient to give an adult son an insurable interest in his father's life. Upon this point all the decisions, so far as we have been able to discover, declare that no such interest exists, although dicta to the opposite effect are no doubt to be found, and in our opinion this declaration is not only supported by the weight of authority, but is also in harmony with the principles upon which the doctrine of insurable interest rests.

The sum of the decisions and of text-book discussion upon the subject of insurable interest may, we think, be fairly stated thus: No person has an insurable interest in the life of another unless he would in reasonable probability suffer a pecuniary loss, or fail to make a pecuniary gain, by the other's death; or (in some jurisdictions) unless, in the discharge of some undertaking, he has spent money, or is about to spend money, for the other's support or advantage. The extent of the insurable interest—the amount for which a policy may be taken out, or for which recovery may be had—is not now under consideration. What is often called "relationship insurance" must be governed by this rule. It must rest upon the foundation of a pecuniary interest, although the interest may be contingent, and need not be capable of exact estimation in dollars and cents. Sentiment or affection is not sufficient of itself, although it may often be influential in persuading a court or jury to reach the conclusion that a beneficiary had a reasonable expectation of pe-that, according to the practice he must insure two years of his son's life, which he did, and the whole case showed perfect bona fides on the part of the father, the policy is not void as in contravention of the statute against wager policies, because the father took an interest in the life of the son only for the whole twenty months; and the sum to be recovered cannot be cut down by any calculation of value made on the principle of the interest insured being reversionary at the time of applying for the insurance, but the whole sum may be recovered. Ibid.

Nor does the fact that a father was put to expense in his son's education give him such interest in his life as would support a policy of insurance thereon in his favor. Worthington v. Curtis, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 419, 45 L. J. Ch. N. E. 259, 33 L. T. N. S. 828, 24 Week. Rep. 228. And see LIFE INSURANCE CLEARING CO. v. O'NEILL.

So, that a father and a son were amicable and affectionate, and that the father was prosperous and the son had remained at home and worked for his father several years after he became of age, without compensation, and had made valuable improvements after he became of age upon a tract of land belonging to his father, under a promise, or well-founded expectation, that the father would give him the land; and that the father had subsequently disposed of it and made no compensation to the son,—is no more than evidence tending to show an insurable interest upon the part of the son in the life of the father, and should not be declared by the court, in an action upon an insurance policy upon the life of the father in favor of the son, to constitute an insurable interest. Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Hogan, 80 Ill. 35, 22 Am. Rep. 190.

In determining whether a son has an insurable interest in the life of his father which will support an insurance procured by the son thereon, the jury, in an action upon the policy thus obtained, should take into account the respective ages and situations in life of the father and son, and their respective business and social relations, and all other facts bearing upon the question of insurable interest at the date of the application for the insurance. Ibid.

In Kane v. Reserve Mut. L. Ins. Co. 9 Phila. 234, however, it was held that a son upon whom his father's family is liable to become a charge upon the death of the father has an insurable interest in his life.

But in Reserve Mut. Ins. Co. v. Kane, 81 Pa. 154, 22 Am. Rep. 741, the judgment in the case above set forth was affirmed, but the affirmation was put upon the ground that the Pennsylvania 54 L. R. A.

poor law of June 13, 1876, § 28, providing that the father and grandfather, and the mother and grandmother, and the children and grandchildren of every poor person not able to work shall, at their own charge, being of sufficient ability, relieve and maintain such poor person, makes maintenance of a father or mother unable to work a legal liability, so that a son would have an insurable interest in the life of his father. But see LIFE INSURANCE CLEARING CO. v. O'NEILL, which is a Federal case originating in Pennsylvania.

The poor law of Illinois, however, making a son liable for the maintenance of his mother, and the mother liable for the maintenance of the son, in the event that one is unable to earn a livelihood and the other is of sufficient ability to provide such support, creates a legal liability in behalf of the county or town, but creates no right of action by the son against the mother or by the mother against the son, and does not give a son an insurable interest in the life of his mother which will sustain a policy issued to him, where the mother was seventy-six years of age when the policy was issued, and he supported and maintained her till the time of her death, and it does not appear that he expected any benefit from her by way of maintenance, service, or the like. People's Mut. Ben. Soc. v. Templeton, 16 Ind. App. 126, 44 N. E. 809.

So, an allegation in an interplea in an action on an insurance policy showing only that the assured was the brother of the insured is insufficient to show an insurable interest in the latter's life. Masonic Benev. Asso. v. Bunch, 109 Mo. 560, 19 S. W. 25.

But one who, upon obtaining life insurance for his own benefit upon the life of a brother, answered in the application therefor that he had an interest in the life to be insured to the full amount applied for, is estopped, in an action against the insurance company to recover the premiums paid after cancellation of the policy, from showing his want of insurable interest, though he was advised by the agent that he had the right to insure the life of his brother, as his ignorance of the law is no excuse. Lewis v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 39 Conn. 104.

Likewise, as a general rule a grandfather is under no legal obligation to support or provide for a grandchild, and a grandchild therefore has no such insurable interest in the life of the grandfather growing out of the relationship alone as will uphold a policy of insurance issued upon his life directly to the grandchild. Burton v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 119 Ind. 209, 21 N. E. 746.

And a complaint in an action upon a policy of insurance issued and made payable directly pecuniary advantage from the continued life of the insured. In one relation only—the relation of husband and wife—is the actual existence of such a pecuniary interest unimportant; the reason being that a real pecuniary interest is found in so great a majority of cases that the courts conclusively presume it to exist in every case, whatever the fact may be, and therefore will not inquire into the true state of a few exceptional instances. This, we think, is essentially what is meant by the declaration of courts and text-book writers that the mere relationship of husband and wife is sufficient to give an insurable interest. The supreme court of Vermont—alone, we think, among judicial tribunals—seems disposed to hold the presumption to be rebuttable. In Currer v. Continental L. Ins. Co. 57 Vt. 496, 52 Am. Rep. 134, it is said: “Admitting that the rule as to the interest necessary to support a contract of life insurance is that the interest must be a pecuniary one, we think that, where no facts are shown in relation to the wife, the presumption is that the husband has an insurable pecuniary interest in her life. He is entitled to her services. There are many cases where she is the real support of her husband and family, or, as is sometimes said, she is the ‘man of the house.’ In all ordinary cases, the husband has a deep interest in the continued life of the wife. Cases may exist where the husband has no interest whatever in his wife’s life. She may be a burden,—a hopeless maniac, or invalid,—and such facts may require the application of a different rule. There are none such in this case, and we only hold that the presumption is that the wife is a help-to a grandchild, insuring the life of her grandfather, does not show a cause of action, in the absence of an allegation that the grandchild had an insurable interest in the life of her grandfather. Ibid.

And a recital in such a complaint that the insurance was procured by the grandfather because he desired to make provision for the grandchild does not warrant the omission of an allegation of insurable interest, where the policy recites payment of the advance premium by the grandchild, and her promise to pay future premiums as therein stipulated as the consideration for the execution of the policy. Ibid.

But an instruction in an action upon an insurance policy that if a grandfather procures an insurance upon his life in favor of a grandson, with whom he lives, the grandson will have such an insurable interest in the life of the grandfather that the policy will not be invalid in the absence of fraud, and that the grandson may maintain an action upon the policy, is not an erroneous proposition of law. Elkhart Mut. Aid. Benev. & Relief Assn. v. Houghton, 108 Ind. 286, 53 Am. Rep. 514, 2 N. E. 768.

II. The rule that close relationship is sufficient.

a. Origin, general statement and scope.

In Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 779, 26 L. ed. 926, the rule was laid down that an insurable interest which will take an insurance policy out of the class of wager policies may be stated generally to be such an interest, arising from the relation of the party obtaining the insurance, either as creditor of or surety for the assured, or from ties of blood or marriage to him, as will justify a reasonable expectation of advantage or benefit from a continuance of his life; and it is not necessary that the expectation of advantage or benefit should be always capable of pecuniary estimation.

This rule was quoted and adopted in Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Lucha, 108 U. S. 498, 27 L. ed. 800, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 949; Ingersoll v. Knights of Golden Rule, 47 Fed. 272; Adams v. Beed (Ky.), 36 S. W. 568; Bayse v. Adams, 81 Ky. 368; Geoffroy v. Gilbert, 5 App. Div. 98, 38 N. Y. Supp. 643, Affirmed in 154 N. Y. 741, 49 N. E. 1097; Grattan v. National L. Ins. Co. 15 Hun, 74; Trinity College v. Travelers’ Ins. Co. 113 N. C. 244, 22 L. R. A. 291, 18 S. E. 175; Keystone Mut. Ben. Assn. v. Morris, 115 Pa. 446, 8 Atl. 638; Corson’s Appeal, 113 Pa. 446, 57 Am. Rep. 479, 6 Atl. 213; Cronin v. Vermont, L. Ins. Co. 20 R. I. 570, 40 Atl. 497; Tate v. Commercial Bldg. Assn. 97 Va. 74, 45 L. R. A. 243, 33 S. E. 384; Roller v. Moore, 86 Va. 512, 54 L. R. A.

And it has been adopted and applied in numerous other cases, and may now be said to be a general, if not the prevailing, rule in the United States.

Under this rule it is assumed that close ties of blood or affinity, as parent, child, brother, sister, husband and wife, with the natural affection and moral forces which generally prompt one such to serve and protect the other, rendering it highly improbable that one for money would take the life of the other, afford a surer guaranty to society against the dangers of betting on the duration of human life than any mere pecuniary interest in the life insured. Crosswell v. Connecticut Indemnity Assn. 51 S. C. 103, 28 S. E. 200, dictum.

And an interest which will support insurance in favor of one party upon the life of another may arise from relationship of blood, or from pecuniary interest. Hilliard v. Sanford, 4 Ohio N. P. 363.

And every person has an insurable interest in the life of any person on whom he depends wholly or in part for education or support. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Hilliard, 16 Ohio C. C. 434.

But to constitute an insurable interest there must in all cases be a reasonable ground, founded upon the relations of the parties to each other, either pecuniary or of blood or marriage, to expect some benefit or advantage from the continuance of the life of the insured. Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 779, 26 L. ed. 926; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Lucha, 108 U. S. 498, 27 L. ed. 800, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 949; Lamont v. Grand Lodge I. L. of H. 81 Fed. 177; Bayse v. Adams, 81 Ky. 368; United Brethren Mut. Aid Soc. v. McDonald, 122 Pa. 324, 1 L. R. A. 238, 15 Atl. 439; Keystone Mut. Ben. Assn. v. Norris, 115 Pa. 446, 8 Atl. 638; Corson’s Appeal, 113 Pa. 446, 57 Am. Rep. 479, 6 Atl. 213; Brady v. Prudential L. Ins. Co. 5 Kulp, 505; Roller v. Moore, 86 Va. 512, sub nom. Roller v. Beam, 6 L. R. A. 136, 10 S. E. 241.

Otherwise the contract is a mere wager by which the party taking the policy is directly interested in the early death of the insured. Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 779, 26 L. ed. 926; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Lucha, 108 U. S. 498, 27 L. ed. 800, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 949; Bayse v. Adams, 81 Ky. 368; United Brethren Mut. Aid Soc. v. McDonald, 122 Pa. 324, 1 L. R. A. 238, 15 Atl. 439; Keystone Mut. Ben. Assn. v. Norris, 115 Pa. 446, 8 Atl. 638; Corson’s Appeal, 113 Pa. 446, 57 Am. Rep. 479, 6 Atl. 213; Brady v. Prudential L. Ins. Co. 5 Kulp, 505.

As to the Pennsylvania rule, see also Lira meet, and the husband has an interest of a pecuniary nature in her living."

In all other relationships there is no presumption of interest, and no insurable interest exists, unless the reasonable likelihood of pecuniary loss or gain is present in actual fact. No doubt, judicial language is to be found supporting the view that the mere relationship of parent and child is sufficient to give an insurable interest. The dictum in Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. ed. 924, is perhaps more often referred to than any other similar declaration, and it may therefore be quoted as an example: "It is not easy to define with precision what will in all cases constitute an insurable interest, so as to take the contract out of the class of wager policies. It may be stated generally, however, to be such an interest, arising from the relations of the party obtaining the insurance, either as creditor of or surety for the assured, or from the ties of blood or marriage to him, as will justify a reasonable expectation of advantage or benefit from the continuance of his life. It is not necessary that the expectation of advantage or benefit should be always capable of pecuniary estimation; for a parent has an insurable interest in the life of his child, and a child in the life of his parent, a husband in the life of his wife, and a wife in the life of her husband. The natural affection in cases of this kind is considered as more powerful—as operating more efficaciously—to protect the life of the insured than any other consideration. But in all cases there must be a reasonable ground, founded upon the relations of the parties to each other, either pecuniary or of blood or affinity, to expect some benefit or advantage

INSURANCE CLEARING CO. V. O'NEILL, which, however, was decided by a Federal court.

So, in Trenton Mut. Life & F. Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 24 N. J. L. 576, it was said that the interest required to support insurance in favor of one upon the life of another need not be such as to constitute the basis of any direct claim in favor of the assured upon the insured. It is sufficient if an indirect advantage may result to the assured from the continuance of the insured's life, and therefore the reciprocal interest of husband and wife, parent and child, and brother and sister in the lives of each other is sufficient to support the contract.

b. Application to interest of child in life of parent.

The general rule in this class of cases is that a wife and children have an insurable interest in the life of the husband and father. Central Nat. Bank v. Hume, 128 U. S. 195, 32 L. ed. 370, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 41.

Thus, a son has an insurable interest in the life of his mother, on account of relationship alone, which will sustain an assignment by the beneficiary to him of a policy procured by the mother on her own life for the benefit of a daughter. Crosswell v. Connecticut Indemnity Assn. 51 S. C. 103, 28 S. E. 200.

So, a daughter living with her father, and presumably dependent upon him for support, has an insurable interest in his life. Geoffroy v. Gilbert, 5 App. Div. 98, 33 N. Y. Supp. 643, affirmed in 154 N. Y. 741, 49 N. E. 1097.

And a life-insurance policy payable to a son of the insured is not a wager policy, where the first premium was paid by the insured and the others by the son, who had general charge of the business of the insured, and forwarded them in her behalf. Heinlein v. Imperial L. Ins. Co. 101 Mich. 250, 25 L. R. A. 627, 59 N. W. 615.

And a child has an insurable interest in the life of a parent who is a member of the household, at least to the extent of burial expenses. Shadlinger v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 30 Ohio L. J. 337.

And a policy of insurance procured by a daughter on the life of her father, without his knowledge, to an amount not more than sufficient to cover his funeral expenses, she signing his name as the applicant by the agent's direction, the agent falsely certifying to the company that he had examined the life to be insured, is not void, and the company cannot be compelled to pay back the premiums. Ibid.

So, an insurable interest of a son or daughter in the life of their mother will be inferred, in the absence of anything tending to show that, notwithstanding such relationship, the transaction was a mere cover for a gambling speculation in the mother's life. Crosswell v. Connecticut Indemnity Assn. 51 S. C. 103, 28 S. E. 200.

In the above case Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Volger, 89 Ind. 572, 46 Am. Rep. 185, supra, I. a., was distinguished upon the ground that that was a case in which a daughter procured insurance on her mother's life for her own benefit, while in the case at bar the policy was procured by the mother on her own life for the benefit of a daughter; and Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Hogan, 80 Ill. 35, 22 Am. Rep. 180, supra, I. a., was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the father was infirm, unable to labor, engaged in no business, and about sixty years of age, and the son who procured the insurance upon his life himself paid the premiums therefor, and was forty years old, and not dependent upon the father, and lived at a distance in another county with his own family on his own farm, the court saying that all that can be said to have been held in that case is that the mere relationship of father and son, where both parties are of mature years and live apart in independent pecuniary circumstances, and mutually independent of each other, and having no business relations with each other, does not create an insurable interest in the son in the life of his father.

And where, under the by-laws of a beneficiary society, the children of a member have the right to be named as beneficiaries, two daughters of a member who are named in her certificate as beneficiaries have such an insurable interest in her life as to entitle them to recover thereon in case of her death. Voorhels v. People's Mut. Ben. Soc. 91 Mich. 469, 51 N. W. 1109.

But an illegitimate child is not a child or relative of her father within the meaning of a statutory provision that children or relatives may be made beneficiaries in certificates of mutual benefit associations. Lavigne v. Ligue Des Patriotes, 178 Mass. 25, 59 N. E. 674.

And no relation or dependency exists between an illegitimate child of a married woman and her putative father which will entitle her to become a beneficiary in a benefit certificate issued to the father under a statutory provision authorizing persons dependent upon a member of the association to be made beneficiaries, where he merely boarded with her mother, paying his board when able, and was under no legal obligation to support the child. Ibid.

So, in Williams v. Washington L. Ins. Co. 81 Iowa, 541, a life insurance policy upon the life of a woman in favor of her daughter was treated as a valid contract, but the decision turned upon other grounds than that of insurable interest.

from the continuance of the life of the assured. Otherwise, the contract is a mere wager, by which the party taking the policy is directly interested in the early death of the assured. Such policies have a tendency to create a desire for the event. They are, therefore, independently of any statute on the subject, condemned, as being against public policy."

The comment upon this passage in the note to Morrell v. Trenton Mut. L. & F. Ins. Co. (Mass.) 57 Am. Dec., on page 96, seems to us to be sound, and we quote it with approval: "If we correctly understand the doctrine here laid down, it amounts simply to this,—that an insurable interest in another's life need not be pecuniary, in the sense of being susceptible of definite 'pecuniary estimation,' nor in the sense of being founded upon any mere pecuniary relation, but that it may rest solely upon ties of blood or affinity, and yet that the mere existence of such a tie is not of itself sufficient to constitute an insurable interest, but that the tie must be such as to give reasonable ground for an expectation of benefit or advantage from the continuance of the life. By 'benefit or advantage,' in this connection, we understand that it must be a material or physical 'benefit or advantage;' that is to say, a mere sentimental benefit arising from a gratification of the affections by the prolongation of the life assured will not suffice. The expected benefit must consist in service, maintenance, or the like. This is equivalent to saying that it must be a pecuniary benefit, as distinguished from a mere sentimental or moral gratification. Thus understood, the doctrine of these cases, which professedly reject the test of pecuniary interest, is not substan-

And in Geoffroy v. Gilbert, 5 App. Div. 98, 88 N. Y. Supp. 643, Affirmed in 154 N. Y. 741, 49 N. E. 1097, it was said that the tendency of the decisions in the English courts was that a minor child had no insurable interest in the life of a father, and this continued to be the law for many years; but that more recently the tendency of the decisions in that respect has been from exceeding strictness to considerable liberality.

So, in Lord v. Dall, 12 Mass. 115, 7 Am. Dec. 88, it was said that the right of a child to effect insurance upon the life of a father who depended on some fund terminable by his death to support the child would never be questioned.

And in Clemmitt v. New York L. Ins. Co. 76 Va. 355, which was an action upon an insurance policy upon the life of a man issued for the sole benefit of his wife and in case of her death before his decease then to be payable to her children, it was determined that the beneficiaries had an insurable interest in the life of the insured; but this was said not to have been questioned.

And in Reserve Mut. Ins. Co. v. Kane, 81 Pa. 154, 22 Am. Rep. 741, it was said, in substance, that it would be technical in the extreme to say that a son has no insurable interest in the life of his father. Poverty might overtake the father in his lifetime, and thus both father and mother be cast upon the son, or, if the father should die before the mother, the necessity of supporting her might fall at once upon the son; and that no injury is done to the insurance company, as it knows, from the very relationship of the parties, that the contract is not a mere gambling adventure, but is founded in the best feelings of human nature.

e. Application to interest of parent in life of child.

Under the doctrine of this class of cases the general rule is that a man has an insurable interest in the lives of his wife and children. Tucker v. Mutual Ben. Life Co. 50 Hun. 54, 4 N. Y. Supp. 505, Affirmed in 121 N. Y. 718, 24 54 L. R. A.

N. E. 1102; Relf v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. (Cin. Super. Ct.) 17 Ins. Chronicle, 3, May, Ins. 3d ed. 180, § 107.

Whether he is in any way dependent upon them or not. Relf v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. (Cin. Super. Ct.) 17 Ins. Chronicle, 3, May, Ins. 3d ed. 180, § 107. But see LIFE INSURANCE CLEARING CO. v. O'NEILL, which is a Federal case.

And the fact that a child is in infancy at the time insurance upon its life is taken out by a parent does not affect the question as to the right of the parent to insure it, as the parent is authorized to recover damages for the loss of expected services of an infant child in an action against another for causing its death through negligence. O'Rourke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 10 Misc. 405, 31 N. Y. Supp. 130.

All that is required to take the case of an insurance by a father on the life of his son out of the objection of being a wager policy is that the father should have some interest in the life of the son,—that his temporal affairs, his just hopes and well-grounded expectations of support, of patronage or advantage in life, will be impaired. Loomis v. Eagle Life & Health Ins. Co. 6 Gray, 396.

And a father who supported, maintained, and educated a son under twenty-one years of age and not emancipated, who, upon the son's going to a different state and engaging in a business enterprise, emancipated him, and made advances to him, has a direct pecuniary interest in his life which will sustain a policy of insurance thereon in his favor. Ibid.

And the nearness or remoteness of the majority of a son upon whose life a father obtained insurance upon emancipating him and making advances to him does not affect the father's insurable interest in his life. Ibid.

In the above case it was said by the court that it believed that the principle laid down in Halford v. Kymer, 10 Barn. & C. 724, supra, II. a, that a man has no such interest in the life of his wife and children, merely in the character of husband or parent, as to sustain an insurance thereon in his favor, is not law, and that it arose partly from a misconstruction of the statute of 14 Geo. III. chap. 48, prohibiting wager policies, which statute has never been in force in this country.

So, a father has such an insurable interest in the life of his son as will warrant an assignment by the son of insurance policies on his own life as security for debts due from the father to a third party, as the assignment would be for the benefit of the father, as well as of the third party. Burslinger v. Bank of Watertown, 67 Wis. 75, 58 Am. Rep. 848, 30 N. W. 290.

tially different from that held in other cases. If it were true that the reasonable expectation of advantage from the continuance of another's life, required to constitute an insurable interest in that life, had reference in any case solely to the satisfaction of an affectionate desire for the prolongation of the life, ought not the insurers to be permitted to show in defense that there was in fact no affection between the parties? And, on the other hand, ought not an insurable interest to be held to exist wherever there is affection, though there was no other relation? Yet we venture to say, on the one hand, that the right of a husband to insure his wife's life would not be denied even if it should be distinctly proved that he had never had the slightest affection for her, and uniformly treated her as a mere household drudge; and, on the other hand, that, where there was no tie giving a reasonable ground to expect service or support, a friendship as warm and abiding as that between Damon and Pythias would not furnish an insurable interest in behalf of one in the life of the other. For a further discussion of this point, see the note to Lord v. Dall (Mass.) 7 Am. Dec. 42."

We think it cannot be doubted that the tendency of the recent decisions is to insist upon an actual or presumed pecuniary interest in every case (although such interest may no doubt be contingent, and to some extent undefined), and to give relationship its proper place by regarding it merely as an important factor in the inquiry, whether such an interest does in reality exist. If, then, the test of pecuniary interest is to be applied to the facts of the present case, it is clear that the son had no insurable in-

And insurance effected by a son on his own life for the benefit of his father is valid. Tucker v. Mutual Ben. Life Co. 50 Hun, 54, 4 N. Y. Supp. 505, Affirmed in 121 N. Y. 718, 24 N. E. 1102.

And where an insurance policy is taken out by the insured and made payable to his executor or administrator for the use of his father, upon his death his executor is a trustee of an express trust to hold the money realized upon the insurance for the father, and in that capacity he is entitled to recover the money. Grattan v. National L. Ins. Co. 15 Hun, 74.

So, while insurance by a mother upon the life of her child might be invalid at common law, by reason of the exclusive right of the father to the benefit of the child's services, it would not be so under N. Y. Laws 1893, chap. 175, clothing a mother with powers, rights, and duties with regard to her children equal to those of her husband, as that statute extends to her the benefit to be derived from the child's services. O'Rourke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 10 Misc. 405, 31 N. Y. Supp. 130.

And a policy of insurance issued in Ontario by a New York insurance company upon a child's life upon the application of its mother, in which the mother is named as a beneficiary, is not invalid as a wager policy, whether the validity is determined by the law of New York or that of Ontario, as, if the Ontario law governs, the insurance on the life of the child by the mother is legalized by 55 Vict. chap. 39, § 35, subsec. 60, and if the New York law governs the rule there is that the parent has an insurable interest in the life of the child. Wakeman v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 30 Ont. Rep. 705.

And while N. Y. Laws 1892, chap. 690, § 55, providing that no policy or agreement for insurance shall be issued upon the life or health of another except upon the application of the person insured; but that a person liable for the support of a child of a designated age may take a yearly renewable term policy of insurance thereon, the amount payable under which shall not exceed specified sums, is to be construed strictly as an act in derogation of the common law, which construction would preclude the giving of effect to a supposed intention of the legislature not actually expressed, so that a policy taken upon the life of a child by virtue of its provisions cannot exceed the specified sum. It does not restrict the parent or person liable for the support of the child to one such contract of insurance, the limit being upon the entire amount to be obtained. O'Rourke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 10 Misc. 405, 31 N. Y. Supp. 130.

was said that between husband and wife and parent and child an insurable interest has universally been held to exist.

And the same rule was adopted in Union Fraternal League v. Walton, 109 Ga. 1, 46 L. R. A. 424, 34 S. E. 317.

And in Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. ed. 924, it was said that a parent has an insurable interest in the life of his child, and the child in the life of his parent, and that the natural affection in cases of this kind is considered as more powerful, and as operating more efficaciously, to protect the life of the insured, than any other consideration.

And this rule was stated and acted upon in Geoffroy v. Gilbert, 5 App. Div. 98, 38 N. Y. Supp. 648, Affirmed in 154 N. Y. 741, 49 N. E. 1097; Hilliard v. Sanford, 4 Ohio N. P. 363; Roller v. Moore, 86 Va. 512, sub nom. Roller v. Beam, 6 L. R. A. 136, 10 S. E. 241; Bursinger v. Bank of Watertown, 67 Wis. 75, 58 Am. Rep. 848, 30 N. W. 290.

And in Loomis v. Eagle Life & Health Ins. Co. 6 Gray, 396, it was said by the court that it could not doubt that a parent has an interest in the life of a child, and, vice versa, a child in the life of a parent, not merely on the ground of a provision of law that parents and grandparents, children and grandchildren, are bound to support their lineal kindred when they may stand in need of relief, but on considerations of strong morals, and the force of natural affection between near kindred, operating often more efficaciously than those of positive law.

So, in Valley Mut. Life Assn. v. Teewalt, 79 Va. 421, it was said to be well settled that a father has an insurable interest in the life of his child, whether a minor or of full age, and the child in the life of his father.

And in Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 24 L. ed. 251, it was said to be well settled that a man has an insurable interest in the lives of his wife and children, and that the essential thing is that the policy shall be obtained in good faith, and not for the purpose of speculating upon the hazard of a life in which the assured has no interest; but the case was one of the validity of an assignment of a policy.

d. Application to interest in lives of brothers or sisters.

Under this rule it has been held broadly and generally that a brother has an insurable interest in the life of his sister. Equitable L. Ins. Co. v. Hazlewood, 75 Tex. 338, 7 L. R. A. 217, 12 S. W. 621.

And a policy of insurance upon a man's life, terest in his father's life. Again, laying aside the effect of the poor law of Pennsylvania, it is plain that the son would lose nothing by his father's death, and would gain nothing by his father's continuance in life. His father did not support him, and he himself had not spent, nor was he about to spend, any money in his father's behalf or support. Upon principle, therefore, we think that the policy cannot be supported.

If we turn to the decided cases, the weight of authority leads to the same conclusion. We have not been referred to any case in which it is held that the mere fact of relationship between a father and his adult son is sufficient. As already stated, dicta to this effect are certainly to be found, notably in Loomis v. Eagle Life & H. Ins. Co. 6 Gray, 396; Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. ed. 924; and Corson's Appeal, 113

Pa. 446, 57 Am. Rep. 479, 6 Atl. 213. But, while these expressions of opinion are entitled to much respect because of the sources from which they come, it is also true that the point was not presented for decision in these cases, and was therefore, presumably, neither argued nor specially considered. For this reason, we cannot give to such expressions the same weight that is properly given to a decision upon the very question. The following cases deal with the insurable interest growing out of the relation of parent and child. Other citations may be found in the note to 57 Am. Dec. 96, and in May, Ins. 4th ed. §§ 104-107. In Illinois, the case of Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Hogan, 80 Ill. 35, 22 Am. Rep. 180, decides that the mere relation of father and son does not give to the son an insurable interest in the life of the father, the court with a stipulation and agreement that the money should be paid to his sister, is sustainable at law on account of the nearness of relationship between the parties,—especially where the sister at the time the insurance was effected was one of the brother's next of kin, prospectively interested in his estate as a distributee. Aetna L. Ins. Co. v. France, 94 U. S. 561, 24 L. ed. 287.

And a young woman without property, who was and had been for several years supported by and educated at the expense of her brother, who stood toward her in loco parentis, was held to have an insurable interest in his life. Lord v. Dall, 12 Mass. 116, 7 Am. Dec. 38.

In the above case it was said that with respect to a child for whose benefit a policy may be effected on the life of its parent the interest, except the insurable one which may result from the legal obligation of the parent to save the child from public charity, is as precarious as that of a sister in the life of an affectionate brother who provides for her.

So, a brother whose sister had lived with him, and who had at times paid her something and given her money, but no account was kept between them, has an insurable interest in her life which will support a policy taken out by him thereon. Keystone Mutual Asso. v. Beaverson, 16 W. N. C. 188.

And a sister with whom a brother had made his home for many years prior to the issuance of an insurance policy on his life in her favor, and to whom he paid no board, and who nursed him in sickness and took care of him as a brother, has an insurable interest in his life at common law. Hosmer v. Welch, 107 Mich. 474, 87 N. W. 504.

And a sister whose brother is indebted to her in a large sum of money has an insurable interest in his life, and a policy thereon for her benefit is not within the prohibition of the statute against wager policies. Goodwin v. Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co. 78 N. Y. 480.

And a policy of insurance obtained by the insured, who directs that a part of the proceeds is to be paid to his brother, is not a wager policy; and the fact that the brother paid the premiums does not invalidate it, as a man may take out a policy of insurance upon his life for the benefit of his brother, and it is immaterial what arrangement is made between them for the payment of the premiums. Fidelity Mut. Life Asso. v. Jeffords, 53 L. R. A. 193, 46 C. C. A. 377, 107 Fed. 402.

And that act contains no restrictions similar to those of § 5851 thereof, as to the amount which a husband or wife may pay in premiums out of her husband's money upon insurance upon his life for her benefit; and therefore it is not a fraud for a brother, who is the head of a family composed of himself, his sister, and her children, to apply his wages, or his exempt property, to the procuring of insurance for her benefit. Ibid.

So, under Mich. Stat. 1887, § 3960d5, providing that no policy of insurance shall issue upon a life in which the beneficiary named has not an insurable interest, and under a later clause of the same section providing that, while any certificate or policy issued in violation of the above section shall be void as to the beneficiary therein named, yet the amount thereof shall, in case of death, be payable to the heirs of the member, where a policy is issued to a member of a beneficiary society made payable to his wife, heirs, administrators or assigns, the policy is payable, upon his death after that of his wife and two children, to his heirs at law, consisting in this case of brothers, sisters, and children of a deceased brother, though they have no insurable interest in his life. Silvers v. Michigan Mut. Ben. Asso. 94 Mich. 39, 53 N. W. 935.

e. Application to interest in lives of other relatives.

The rule has been laid down generally that a granddaughter has an insurable interest in the life of her grandfather. Breeze v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 37 App. Div. 152, 55 N. Y. Supp. 775.

And policies of insurance taken out by a woman in her own name, and afterwards delivered to a daughter-in-law with directions to pay the premiums on them and to pay the funeral expenses of the insured from their proceeds, and that what was left should go to her granddaughter, are not invalid as wager policies. Burke v. Prudential Ins. Co. 155 Pa. 295, 26 Atl. 445.

So, in Hilliard v. Sanford, 4 Ohio N. P. 263, decided in the Licking common pleas court in 1897, it was held that a grandfather has an insurable interest in the life of a grandson so as to relieve the contract of insurance from the charge of being a wagering contract, since the relationship is a good consideration for, and will support, a deed or a gift or a grant; and that the Ohio statute against wagering or betting and gambling applies only to games and such things, and does not apply to a contract of insurance procured by a grandfather upon the life of his grandson.

But in Union C. L. Ins. Co. v. Hilliard, 16 Ohio C. C. 434, it was said that Connecticut Mut. L.

saying that the son must also have a well-founded or visible expectation of some pecuniary advantage to be derived from the continuance of his father's life; and the recent case of Chicago Guaranty Fund Life Soc. v. Dyon, 79 Ill. App. 100, repeats the ruling, that the mere relationship of father and adult son is not sufficient to give the son an insurable interest in the father's life. The point decided in Mitchell v. Union L. Ins. Co. 45 Mo. 105, 71 Am. Dec. 529, was that a father has an insurable interest in the life of his minor son, but the court added the dictum—which may be cited in connection with opposing expressions of opinion—that “a father, as such, has no insurable interest, resulting merely from that relation, in the life of a child of full age.” The supreme court of Indiana in Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Volger, 89 Ind.

572, 46 Am. Rep. 185, held that a daughter has no insurable interest in the life of her mother, saying that the insurable interest in the life of another must be a pecuniary interest, and adding: “Some of the authorities tend in the direction that near relationship, as between parent and child, is a sufficient foundation upon which to rest an insurable interest, but this view is not sustained by the weight of authority.” Wake-man v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 30 Ont. Rep. 705, decided that a parent has a valid insurable interest in the life of a minor child. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. v. Brant, 47 Mo. 419, 4 Am. Rep. 328, which was an action on a policy in favor of a wife upon the death of her husband, contains a dictum that “at common law the insurable interest in the life of another person must be a direct and definite pecuniary interest, and a person has

Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 24 L. ed. 251, and Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. France, 94 U. S. 581, 27 L. ed. 287, do not go to the extent of holding that a grandfather has an insurable interest in the life of his grandson; and that no such question was before the court in either case.

And in Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Hilliard, 16 Ohio C. C. 434, which probably grew out of the same facts as Hilliard v. Sanford, 4 Ohio N. P. 363, supra, which was decided about a year later by the Licking county circuit court, it was said by the court that nowhere did it find it even suggested that a grandfather had an insurable interest in the life of a grandson, but that there might be some statutory provision applying to the case by which grandchildren and grandparents are bound to care for and support each other. But the case turned upon the question of usury in a loan which the insurance policy in question was taken out to secure.

So, the mere relation of uncle and nephew does not constitute an insurable interest which will enable either to insure the life of the other, in the absence of any pecuniary interest. Singleton v. St. Louis Mut. Ins. Co. 66 Mo. 63, 27 Am. Rep. 321.

And a nephew has not an insurable interest in the life of his aunt by force of the mere relationship existing between them. Corson's Appeal, 113 Pa. 446, 57 Am. Rep. 479, 6 Atl. 218.

And a policy of insurance obtained by an uncle upon the life of his nephew, with whom he lives and whom he supports upon a farm owned by his sister, the uncle paying the premiums and the policy being payable to him, is invalid for want of an insurable interest. Prudential Ins. Co. v. Jenkins, 15 Ind. App. 297, 43 N. E. 1056.

And the burden rests with an uncle who took out insurance upon the life of his nephew to show, in an action on the insurance policy, some pecuniary interest to support the policy besides the mere interest arising from relationship. Singleton v. St. Louis Mut. Ins. Co. 66 Mo. 63, 27 Am. Rep. 321.

But an aunt whose niece lives with her and has done so from early childhood at different times amounting to years, their relations being those of mother and daughter, the aunt supporting the niece, has an insurable interest in the life of the niece, in view of the moral obligation from which she has the right to expect care and kindness from the niece in case of need. Cronin v. Vermont L. Ins. Co. 20 B. I. 570, 40 Atl. 497.

So, that a person obtaining insurance upon the life of another for her benefit was the niece of the insured, and that the uncle had raised her and been a father to her all her life, and that she had lived with him until her marriage, 64 L. R. A.

and that she had always helped support the uncle, are sufficient evidence of insurable interest in his life to warrant the submission, in an action upon the insurance policy of that question to the jury. McGraw v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 5 Pa. Super. Ct. 488.

In Mowry v. Home L. Ins. Co. 9 R. I. 353, however, which was an action by a nephew to recover the amount of a policy of insurance effected by him upon the life of his uncle, it was in effect determined that some interest on the part of the nephew in the life of the uncle other than that growing out of the mere relationship was necessary to sustain the policy; and it was held that the burden of proof rests with the insurance company to show that statements made by the nephew in his application as to his interest in his uncle's life were untrue.

So, the relationship of cousins between the insured and assured does not give the assured such an insurable interest in the life of the insured as will take the policy out of the wager class. Brady v. Prudential L. Ins. Co. 5 Kulp, 505.

Likewise, Union Fraternal League v. Walton, 109 Ga. 1, 46 L. R. A. 424, 34 S. E. 317, inferentially determined that one cousin has not an insurable interest in the life of another; but it was said that the true rule which should attain in such cases is that where one obtains a contract of insurance on his own life, and keeps up the same out of his own means, and directs the amount of the policy to be paid at his death to another, whom, from love, friendship, or any other reason, he desires to benefit, the named beneficiary is entitled to recover on such contract, notwithstanding it may not be shown that he or she has any other insurable interest in the life of the deceased than exists in good will, and emanates from his expressed wish to benefit.

III. Consent of the insured.

As in case of insurance by a wife of the life of her husband, consent of the assured would seem to be necessary to the validity of insurance by one relative upon the life of another, whatever the degree of relationship, and whether an insurable interest existed or not.

Thus, a life-insurance policy issued to a son upon the life of his father is invalid where the father did not give his consent that the son should be made the beneficiary. Chicago Guaranty Fund Life Soc. v. Dyon, 79 Ill. App. 100.

And insurance policies issued upon the life of a father to his daughter, without previous knowledge or consent upon his part, and without a medical examination, are invalid, and the not such an interest in the life of his wife or child merely in the character of husband or parent." In Valley Mut. Life Assn. v. Teewalt, 79 Va. 423, decided in 1884, it does not appear whether the son was a minor or an adult, nor whether the son had taken out the policy on his father's life, or was merely the beneficiary in a policy taken out and maintained by the father himself. But, assuming the facts to have been as they are in the case now being considered, we cannot agree with the assertion of the supreme court of appeals of Virginia that "it is now well settled that a father has an insurable interest in the life of his child, whether a minor or of full age, and the child in the life of his father." Two cases are cited in support of this assertion, the first being Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. ed. 924, in which the validity of an assignment of a life policy, made to a person having no insurable interest, was the point at issue,—the declaration concerning the interest between parent and child being merely a dictum,—and the second case being Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Luchs, 108 U. S. 498, 27 L. ed. 800, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 940, in which the point decided was that one partner had an insurable interest in the life of his copartner. We think, therefore, it may be safely said that the Virginia court was perhaps overconfident in declaring the proposition just quoted to be well settled. In the English courts it has been distinctly decided that a father has no pecuniary interest in the life even of his minor son (Halford v. Kymer, 10 Barn. & C. 725); and in Worthington v. Curtis, L. R. 1

Ch. Div. 419, the court assumed, as a proposition that did not need discussion, that a father has no insurable interest in the life of his adult son. The cases thus cited and referred to are, with few exceptions, the only cases in which the question now before us has been passed upon, and they certainly justify the conclusion that there is a conflict of opinion, if not of decision, upon the question now before the court. But, while this is true, the weight of authority is, in our opinion, against the position that an adult son has an insurable interest in the life of his father merely by virtue of kinship. The current of the recent decisions shows a clear tendency to insist upon the existence of a pecuniary interest, actual or contingent, upon the part of the son before he can take out a valid policy upon his father's life.

It remains to consider the poor law of Pennsylvania, and Reserve Mut. Ins. Co. v. Kane, 81 Pa. 154, 22 Am. Rep. 741. The opinion in that case is as follows: "By the 28th section of the poor law of June 13, 1836, the father and grandfather, and the mother and grandmother, and the children and grandchildren, of every poor person not able to work, shall, at their own charge, being of sufficient ability, relieve and maintain such poor person, at such rate as the court of quarter sessions of the proper county shall order and direct. Maintenance of a father or mother unable to work is therefore a legal liability. When we add to this the feelings of natural affection and the desire produced by these feelings to provide for the comforts of parents, the right to premiums paid thereon may be recovered, where the daughter was induced to take them out by the representations of the company's agent that she should not lose the money paid thereon, and it does not appear that she was aware that such insurance was against public policy. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Blesch, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 530, 58 S. W. 436.

IV. Conclusion.

The early rule in England, based on the statute 14 Geo. III., chap. 48, prohibiting wager policies, was that, to support insurance on the life of another, there must have been a pecuniary interest on the part of the insured in the life of the assured, and the interest ordinarily growing out of relationship or consanguinity is not alone sufficient. And the pecuniary interest must have been such as to amount to a claim recognizable and enforceable in law as distinguished from a mere expectation. This rule, though based upon a statute which never became a part of American jurisprudence, was, and still is, followed to some extent by courts in the United States.

The rule prevailing in many of the American states, however, is generally stated to be that an insurable interest which will take an insurance policy out of the class of wager policies is such an interest arising from ties of blood or other relations as will justify a reasonable expectation of advantage or benefit from a continuance of the life of the assured, and that it is not necessary that the expectation of advantage or benefit should be always capable of pecuniary estimation. This rule, it would appear, does not dispense entirely with a pecuniary interest, but merely permits that interest to consist of a mere expectation of a pecuniary benefit as distinguished from the requirement of the other rule that the interest must amount to a claim recognizable and enforceable in law. The later or American rule, therefore, would include the interest which a child might have in the life of its parent or a parent in the life of a child, or that which might exist between brothers and sisters based upon the affection supposed to exist between them; and the supposition and expectation that one would render the other pecuniary aid in case of need; while the former rule would cover the case of the interest of a child in the life of its parent only in case the child was a minor and entitled to support from the parent; and the case of the interest of a parent in the life of a child only when the child is legally bound to support the parent; and the interest between brothers and sisters based on affection only is not sufficient to support insurance by the one upon the life of the other.

The more distant relationships, however, such as that between grandparents and grandchildren, uncles or aunts, and nephews or nieces, and cousin and cousin, are not generally regarded under either rule as sufficiently conducive to love, affection, and interest to warrant insurance by one upon the life of the other, though exceptions have been made in case of grandparents and grandchildren in a few instances.

effect an insurance on the life of the parent, to carry out these purposes, ought not to be denied. It would be technical in the extreme to say that a son has no insurable interest in his father's life. Poverty may overtake the father in his lifetime, and thus both father and mother be cast upon the son; or, if the father die before her, the necessity may fall at once upon the son. Why, then, should he not be permitted to make a provision, by insurance, to reimburse himself for his outlays, past or future? What injury is done to the insurance company? They receive the full premium, and they know in such case, from the very relationship of the parties, that the contract is not a mere gambling adventure, but is founded in the best feelings of our nature, and on a legal duty which may arise at any time. We are of opinion that the policy is not void."

From this statement of the grounds of decision, it is apparent that the principal reliance of the court is upon the obligation created by the poor law of Pennsylvania. The fact of relationship is referred to, but not dwelt upon, and it is certainly not distinctly put forward in support of the court's conclusion. Turning, therefore, to § 28 of the act of 1836 (P. L. 547), we find the statutory provision to be as follows: "The father and grandfather, and the mother and grandmother, and the children and grandchildren, of every poor person not able to work, shall, at their own charge, being of sufficient ability, relieve and maintain such poor person, at such rate as the court of quarter sessions of the county where such poor person resides shall order and direct, on pain of forfeiting a sum not exceeding $20 for every month they shall fail therein, which shall be levied by the process of the said court, and applied to the relief and maintenance of such poor person."

Other sections of the act make it plain that the primary obligation to furnish support to any poor person is imposed upon the poor district, and that § 28 is intended to relieve the district, and not to create a legal right that is directly enforceable at the suit of the poor person against the son or the father, as the case may be. It is, of course, well known that the legal obligation of the father, under the common law, to maintain his child, ceases as soon as the child becomes of age, and that there is no legal obligation resting upon a child to support a parent. Schouler, Dom. Rel. 2d ed. pp. *321, 365, and cases cited. The obligation under the various poor laws is ordinarily a duty directly owing to the district, and only indirectly owing to the poor person. This consideration was apparently influential in determining the appellate court of Indiana to hold that a son has no insurable interest in his mother's life by virtue of a similar statutory provision, although other reasons are also given by the court for this ruling. People's Mut. Ben. Soc. v. Templeton, 16 Ind. App. 126, 44 N. E. 809. We are not disposed, however, to lay any stress upon the indirect character of the obligation mutually to support each other, thus laid upon parent and child by the poor law of Pennsylvania. The obligation exists, no matter for whose benefit directly, nor at whose suit it may be enforceable, and we shall consider it as if the statute made it directly available by the person reduced to poverty and needing support. Thus considered, what bearing has the section quoted upon the question now before the court? Manifestly, it affects an adult son in two ways: First, it makes him liable to support his father, if the son be of sufficient ability; and, second, it makes the father liable to support his son, if the father be of sufficient ability. The supreme court of Pennsylvania in Kane's Case considered the subject exclusively from the first point of view, namely, the son's liability to support the father, and put the decision on the son's right to be reimbursed for outlays, past and future, in discharge of such liability. There is no doubt that the actual expenditure of money by the son for the purpose of supporting his father would give the son an insurable interest in the father's life; nor is there any doubt that a policy could be taken out by the son to provide for the repayment of similar expenditures to be made in the future. But, if no expenditure is actually made, there is no right of recovery; and, in any event, recovery is to be limited to the amount expended. This has been several times decided by the supreme court of Pennsylvania.—Seigrist v. Schmoltz, 113 Pa. 326, 6 Atl. 47, being, perhaps, the leading case,—and, if the principle of these recent decisions had been applied to the facts of Reserve Mut. Ins. Co. v. Kane, it would have prevented recovery in that case. There was no evidence there to show that the son had spent any money in his father's support; and, as this is true of the pending action also, we think it follows that the plaintiff below had no claim founded upon the poor law of the state. He had paid nothing to support his father, and therefore had no claim to be reimbursed. The word implies a previous payment, an expenditure actually made, for which the person paying is to be made good.

The second provision of the Pennsylvania poor law that is referred to in the foregoing paragraph of this opinion makes the father liable to support his adult son if the latter falls into poverty; and this, we think, would give the son an insurable interest in his father's life, if the remaining condition of the statute is found to exist; namely, sufficient ability, present or prospective, upon the part of the father. Two things must concur before the obligation is enforceable,—the son must be unable to work, and the father must be of sufficient ability to respond to the call for support. Clearly, therefore, the insurable interest of the son depends upon the father's ability to discharge the obligation, or, at the best, upon the reasonable prospect that the father will be of sufficient ability. Where there is no evidence, as there was none in the case at bar, to justify a finding that the father had, or would ever have, the ability to support the son in case of need, a necessary prerequisite to the right of support is wanting, and a necessary prerequisite, also, of the right to insure the father's life. The son's interest was, not that his father should live in order to be his support if want should overtake him, but that the father should die, in order that premiums should cease upon the policy, and the principal sum should become presently payable.

Without further elaboration, we may state our conclusions as follows:

(1) The mere relationship of father and son does not give an adult son an insurable interest in his father's life. Such an interest may exist under the circumstances of a particular case, but relationship alone is not sufficient to establish it.

(2) Under the poor law of Pennsylvania, an adult son has an interest in his father's life sufficient to support a policy of insurance for either or both of two purposes,—to reimburse him for payments actually made, or to be made, on his father's behalf; and to protect him against the loss of his father's support, when there is a reasonable expectation that his father will be of sufficient ability to respond to the call that may be made upon him.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded, with instructions to enter judgment upon the reserved point in favor of the defendant.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FOURTH CIRCUIT.

Walker NEWTON, Appt.,

v.

THE CARRIE L. TYLER.

(45 C. C. A. 374, 106 Fed. 422.)

A vessel having no propelling power of her own, and in charge of a tug having on board a licensed pilot, is subject to the provisions of a state statute requiring vessels entering a certain port to take a licensed pilot, or, in case of refusal, to pay his regular fee.

(February 7, 1901.)

APPEAL by libellant from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of North Carolina dismissing a libel filed to enforce payment of pilotage fees. Reversed.

Statement by Simonton, Circuit Judge:

The barge Carrie L. Tyler has been employed in carrying phosphate rock from the port of Charleston, South Carolina, to the port of Wilmington, North Carolina. Her tonnage is 565 tons gross, 503 tons net. She is enrolled at Charleston. She draws 18 feet. This barge carries two low masts, with a spread of sails used to steady her at sea, but entirely incapable of propelling her; and, in fact, she is without any propelling power whatever. When she was towed towards the mouth of Cape Fear river, she was taken in tow by the tug Alexander Jones, a regular coastwise steam tug. The master of this tug and her first mate are both duly licensed as branch pilots for the Cape Fear river and bar. The libellant is a duly-licensed pilot of the Cape Fear river and bar. On three separate occasions while on his cruise he saw the Carrie L. Tyler proceeding towards and crossing the bar of the Cape Fear river, and on each occasion proffered his services as pilot to her. On each occasion his proffer was refused. He thereupon filed his libel in rem against the said barge, demanding the fee to which he would have been entitled had he piloted the barge. Under the law of North Carolina the pilot fees for all vessels drawing 18 feet is $143, except coastwise vessels. These are entitled to a discount of 25 per cent, leaving $107.25. For the three occasions he demands $321.75. The answer denies all liability to libellant on the facts stated. The district court disallowed the claim, and dismissed the libel. 103 Fed. 327.

The statutes of North Carolina under which libellant claims are as follows:

"Sec. 3496. When the Master of Vessel Need not Take Pilot. 1858-9, chap. 23, § 8. No master of a vessel shall be required to take or keep a pilot on board or pay for pilotage in the river or over bars, who is or has been a full branch pilot, or employs a full branch pilot as first mate of his vessel."

"Sec. 3499. Rights of Pilots as to Main and New Inlet Bars of Cape Fear. Rev. Code, chap. 85, § 11; 1797, chap. 486, § 1. The pilots having branches to pilot over the Main bar, or New Inlet bar, of Cape Fear river, shall be entitled to pilot and navigate vessels into port over either bar; and the pilot who shall bring a vessel into port over either bar shall be entitled, exclusively, to navigate the same vessel out of port over either bar. Provided, when any vessel shall be ready to go out of port, and such pilot does not attend to navigate the same, the captain or master may employ any other pilot for that purpose, such other pilot being a branch or commissioned pilot for the bar over which the vessel is to be navigated out; and every pilot who shall navigate a vessel out of port contrary to this section shall for every such offense forfeit and pay $40 to the pilot or pilots, who, by this charter, would have been entitled to navigate said vessel out of port."

"Sec. 3502. Pilots Refused, Entitled to Full Pilotage. Rev. Codes, chap. 85, § 14; 1784, chap. 207, § 8. When any master of a vessel, not having a pilot on board, coming over the bar into the Cape Fear river; or being in the river and going out of either of the inlets, shall refuse a pilot across the bar, then each pilot so refused shall be entitled to the same pilotage as if he had been actually employed to pilot, and had piloted such vessel."

"Sec. 3503. One-Third Fees to be Paid to Pilots in Certain Cases. Rev. Codes, chap. 85, § 15; 1786, chap. 262, § 6. When any vessel shall come over the bar before a pilot boards her, she shall pay only one-third fees for coming in, unless when it may happen the weather is so bad that no person can board a vessel, in which case, if he shall hail her without the bar, he shall be entitled to full fees."

"Sec. 3505. Pilot Entitled to Full Pay though Refused, When. Rev. Codes, chap. 85, § 17; 1813, chap. 866; 1823, chap. 1222, §§ 1, 2; 1831, chap. 65; 1840, chap. 48; 1856-57, chap. 1. When a master of a vessel shall refuse a pilot either up or down the Cape Fear river, then each pilot so refused shall be entitled to the full pilotage in the same manner as he would have been had he been actually employed for the purpose of piloting such vessel. But any vessel under 60 tons burden shall not be compelled to take a pilot while crossing the bar, or pay pilotage, except where signals are made for a pilot; and no vessel coming in at either of the said inlets with a view to the more convenient prosecution of her voyage, or to make a harbor, shall be subject to the payment of pilotage."

Argued before Goff and Simonton, Circuit Judges.

Mr. Thomas Evans, for appellant:

Where a pilot service was refused the pilot was by law entitled to the same compensation that he would have been entitled to had he actually been accepted and performed the service.

To hold that this class of merchant vessels should be exempt from pilotage charges would be a discrimination against sailing, which at present is unlawful, and which would in a short period exclude all sailing vessels from commerce and navigation.

U. S. Rev. Stat. 4385, shows the only class of unrigged vessels that are exempted. The barge Carrie L. Tyler is not of the exempted class.

The tugboat, being a coastwise steamer, was not required to take a pilot. The pilots on her were not on pilotage duty to the barge during the towage operation. The whole liability of the towboats was under contract for towage; if they failed in their contract, that fact does not interest the appellant in this case.

In the absence of legislation by Congress, the states have the power to regulate the subject of pilotage.

Messrs. Robert G. Bickford and Samuel Park, with Mr. George Rountree, for petitioner:

The Energy, L. R. 3 Adm. & Eccl. Rep. 52, is predicated upon the fact that the position of a pilot in English waters is upon the tow, and not upon the tug, and that the pilot who is on board the tow directs the navigation of the tug, and therefore has no application to the law governing the relation of a tug and tow in the United States. This custom seems to have been dictated by experience, and has received the sanction of many legal decisions in Great Britain.

The doctrine has long been established in this country, by many cases, that a steam vessel having a tow is bound to bring to that service reasonable prudence, caution, and skill in the management, direction, and control of the navigation of the tow, and for any failure thereof the steam tug is liable.

The obligation of the steam vessel which had the petitioner's barge Carrie L. Tyler in tow was to tow her from port to port.

The district court found that the statutes of North Carolina did not contemplate requiring barges without motive power, in tow of a steam tug having a regular, duly licensed pilot on board, to employ a pilot. The statutes of North Carolina making compulsory the payment of pilotage for services tendered to barges in tow of a coastwise steam tug are in violation of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4444.

A steam vessel and her tow for purposes of navigation are considered in law one vessel, and that a steam vessel.

Simonton, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

No objection has been or can be made to the jurisdiction of the court below. Hobart v. Drogan, 10 Pet. 120, 9 L. ed. 363. Nor can any objection be made to the provision of the law giving a pilot the same fees for services tendered and refused as he would have earned if the services had been accepted and performed. Cooley v. Philadelphia Port Wardens, 12 How. 299, 13 L. ed. 996. The sole question in the case is this: Was this barge, being wholly without motive power of any kind, bound by law to accept the services of a pilot while she was in tow of a steam tug whose master was a licensed pilot of the bar and river over which she was navigating? The point is a narrow one. It is a municipal regulation of the state of North Carolina, recognized and made of force under the legislation of Congress. Cooley v. Philadelphia Port Wardens, 12 How. 299, 13 L. ed. 996. No decision of any court in that state has been quoted, and none can be found, bearing on this question. It comes up for the first time for adjudication. The class of pilots has existed from the earliest times, and laws have been enacted in every nation engaged in commerce regulating and protecting them. The purpose of these laws is to insure at all times a due supply of men well qualified by skill, knowledge, and experience to protect vessels entering into ports and harbors from the dangers of navigation. They are engaged in a perilous calling, and must be ready to brave the perils of their vocation. To encourage such men, and to secure permanence in their ranks, every nation engaged in commerce, and all the states in the Union having harbors, have enacted laws making it compulsory upon all vessels entering their ports, except those of very small tonnage, to employ a duly licensed pilot for the purpose of piloting them. The propriety and legality of these regulations by the states have been sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States. Pacific Mail S. S. Co. v. Joliffe, 2 Wall. 450, 17 L. ed. 805; Wilson v. McNamee, 102 U. S. 572, 26 L. ed. 234. And these cases also sustain the regulation that if a pilot offer his services, and they be refused, he is entitled to be paid the pilotage, unless some other pilot be first engaged. Mr. Justice Curtis, in Cooley v. Philadelphia Port Wardens, 12 How. 312, 13 L. ed. 1002, speaking on this subject, says: "We think this particular regulation concerning half-pilotage fees is an appropriate part of a general system of regulations of this subject. Testing it by the practice of commercial states and countries legislating on this subject, we find it has usually been deemed necessary to make similar provisions. Numerous laws of this kind are cited in the learned argument of the counsel for the defendant in error; and their fitness, as a part of a system of pilotage, in many places, may be inferred from their existence in so many different states and countries. Like other laws, they are framed to meet the most usual cases. Quæ frequentius accidunt. They rest upon the propriety of securing lives and property exposed to the perils of a dangerous navigation by taking on board a person peculiarly skilled to encounter or avoid them; upon the policy of discouraging the commanders of vessels from refusing to receive such persons on board at the proper times and places; and upon the expediency, and even intrinsic justice, of not suffering those who have incurred labor, and expense, and danger, to place themselves in a position to render important service generally necessary, to go unrewarded, because the master of a particular vessel either rashly refuses their proffered assistance, or, contrary to the general experience, does not need it. There are many cases in which an offer to perform, accompanied by present ability to perform, is deemed by law equivalent to performance. The laws of commercial states and countries have made an offer of pilotage service one of those cases; and we cannot pronounce a law which does this to be so far removed from the usual and fit scope of laws for the regulation of pilots and pilotage as to be deemed, for this cause, a covert attempt to legislate upon another subject under the appearance of legislating on this one."

This compulsion exists on the masters of all vessels, notwithstanding that they themselves, by frequent visits to the port, may possess sufficient knowledge to cross the bar and navigate the rivers in safety. In every case the language is general—"every ship or vessel." The North Carolina statute says: "When any master of a vessel, not having a pilot on board, coming over the bar of Cape Fear river or being in the river and going out either of the inlets, shall refuse a pilot across the bar, then each pilot so refused shall be entitled to the same pilotage as if he had been actually employed to pilot and had piloted such vessel."

An examination of the regulations will disclose that the rates of pilotage are fixed by the draught of the vessel, and upon all vessels alike,—steam or sail vessels. The appellee claims that the barge in the case at bar was exempt from this regulation of the statute for two reasons: First, because she had no motive power in herself, and therefore could not be navigated by a pilot; second, because the tug already had on board of her a duly licensed pilot of the bar and river of the Cape Fear. It is true that the barge had no motive power in herself, but she supplied motive power when she engaged the services of the tug. She then began to be navigated, and by her great draught of 18 feet she encountered the dangers of the shoals and narrows of the bar and river. A vessel with all her sails furled has no power of locomotion, and in tow of a tug is absolutely dependent upon it; yet in no instance in any port is a vessel in this condition exempted from taking a pilot simply because she is in tow of a tug. A tug is engaged in the service of towage. This is her contract, and that is all for which she can be held responsible. "The parties to this contract contemplate risk in the performance of it,—the risk of winds and waves, and of obstacles, floating or fixed, that lie about or in her path." Mac-lachlan, Merchant Shipping, p. 286. But the pilot contracts to navigate the vessel safely through the narrow channels of the bar and river; a danger not seen, and only known by long observation and experience. So distinct are the duties of the tow and of the pilot that Dr. Lushington always held that the tug was subservient to and must obey the pilot on the vessel in tow. The Energy, L. R. 3 Adm. & Eccl. Rep. 52. But the appellee contends that, as the tug had on board, in her master, a regularly licensed pilot, no pilot was needed for the vessel. But the law is imperative. A vessel must have a pilot, whether she needs one or not; and this to secure compensation to the privileged class of pilots. As has been said, very many ship masters, by frequent visits to ports, learn and know the channels. But this does not exempt them from employing a pilot. Gerrish v. Johnson, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 335. Again, the tug master was present, managing his tug, not as a pilot, not performing his duty as a pilot, and incurring liability as such, not charging or receiving compensation as a pilot, but engaged simply in the performance of his duty as tow master, and in fulfilling that, a wholly distinct, contract. The Congress of the United States has passed an act which exempts coastwise seagoing steam vessels from compulsory pilotage if they be under the control and direction of a pilot licensed by the United States inspectors of steamboats. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4444. But this section in its terms is confined to coastwise seagoing steam vessels, and under the rule, Expressio unius exclusio alterius no other class of vessels comes within this act. See Sprague v. Thompson, 118 U. S. 95, 30 L. ed. 117, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 988.

The evidence does not disclose whether the barge was towed by a line, or whether the tug was alongside of her. If the former mode of towing was used, it was necessary that the barge should have at her helm an experienced navigator, not only to enable her to follow the general direction of the tug, but also cognizant of the dangers of the channel, so as to keep clear of them. If the tug were alongside, her helmsman must exercise the same care and be possessed of the same knowledge. It is said, however, that the tug and tow are, in contemplation of law, one vessel, and that one under steam, thus giving to the combination the character of the tug. So they are for some purposes. They are governed by the international rules applicable to vessels approaching each other, and must observe the regulations applicable to steam vessels. The Civitta & The Restless, 103 U. S. 699, 26 L. ed. 599. But they are so far distinct from each other that, if a collision takes place, the tug can be held liable to the exoneration of the tow. Cushing v. The John Fraser, 21 How. 184, sub nom. The James Gray v. The John Fraser, 16 L. ed. 106. The rubric of that case is this: Although the tow was the res or thing which struck the brig and did the damage, that does not make her liable for the injury, unless the collision was occasioned by her fault. In the recent case of The Minnie, 40 C. C. A. 312, 100 Fed. 128, we held the tug responsible for a collision, exonerating the tow. It seems, therefore, that a tug and her tow are not one vessel, except under certain peculiar circumstances, such as approaching a vessel whose movements are not controlled by steam. The learned counsel for the appellee quotes and relies upon The Glaramara, 8 Sawy. 22, 10 Fed. 678. But that case depends upon the local law of Oregon. He also quotes Judge Lowell, in Flanders v. Tripp, 2 Low. Dec. 15, Fed. Cas. No. 4,854. But in that case the vessel had encountered stress of weather, which had disabled her entirely. The master, leaving her in charge of the mate, had gone for assistance. Meanwhile a pilot boarded her for the purposes of salvage. The judge ruled that he could not, under these circumstances, compel her to accept his services, nor to pay him because of his tender of them. The language of Mr. Justice Grier, in Smith v. The Creole, 2 Wall. Jr. 485, Fed. Cas. No. 13,033, is not inapplicable to this case: "As a general rule, masters of vessels are not expected to be, and cannot be, acquainted with the rocks and shoals on every coast, nor able to conduct a vessel safely into every port. Nor can the absent owners, or their agent, the master, be supposed capable of judging of the capacity of persons offering to serve as pilots. They need a servant, but are not in a situation to test or judge of his qualifications, and have not, therefore, the information necessary to choice. The pilot laws kindly interfere, and do that for the owners which they could not do for themselves. It selects persons of skill and experience, and requires them to give bonds for the faithful performance of their duties; and if it should happen in some particular cases that owners may not need the services of such pilot selected by law, it is but just that they should contribute to the support of a system instituted for their benefit."

We are of the opinion that the barge comes within the letter of the law, and that the court below should have found for the libellant. Let the case be remanded to the district court for such further proceedings as may be necessary.

The decree of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded to that court.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FIFTH CIRCUIT.

Err.,

v.

Jose TARIN.

(47 C. C. A. 648, 108 Fed. 734.)

A railroad company is liable for injuries to a passenger by the overturning of the car where it leaves her in the car without warning because she cannot understand the language in which other passengers are warned, after the engine has been overturned by a washout, and the water is running along the track on which the car stands, in such a way as to undermine one side of it and render an overturning of the car probable.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been negligently inflicted upon plaintiff's wife while she was a passenger upon defendant's road. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Pardee, McCormick, and Shelby, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. T. J. Beall and Wyndham Kemp, for plaintiff in error:

The contract of the carrier of passengers is that he will use the utmost care and prudence to transport his passengers with safety; but where the proximate cause is an act of God, or an extraordinary rainfall, which human foresight could not reasonably anticipate and provide against, the carrier is not liable.

NOTE.—The above decision is probably without any exact precedent, but it may be regarded as in some sense analogous to those decisions which hold the carrier liable to special care or duty toward persons who stand in more than ordinary need of protection.

The test of liability is, not whether the company used such particular precaution as, it is evident after the accident happened, might have averted it had the danger been known, but whether it used that degree of care and prudence which cautious and competent persons would have used, under the apparent circumstances of the case, to prevent the accident, without reasonable knowledge that it was likely to occur.

Mr. George E. Wallace for defendant in error.

McCormick, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Jose Tarin brought this action to recover damages of the Southern Pacific Company for personal injuries sustained by his wife Rosa Tarin, while a passenger on the company's railroad train near Stanwix, in the territory of New Mexico. The accident occurred on July 19, 1899. The petition charges that, through the gross negligence and carelessness of the company and its servants, the car on which the plaintiff's wife was a passenger, and the train to which it was attached, was run off the track, and thrown from the roadbed, and turned over from the embankment, and that Rosa Tarin was thereby thrown with violence against the seats and sides of the car, and seriously and permanently injured. It charges, further, that the portion of the track at the point where the injuries were received was defective, unsafe, and dangerous for trains to pass over; that the train was negligently and carelessly operated thereon, and the defendant's servants were careless and unskilful in failing to keep a proper lookout or failing to make proper inspection, in order to discover the condition of the track and avoid accident and injury, and that after the train had been run to this part of the track, and the employees had discovered that they had run into a washout, they backed the train for some distance, and ordered the passengers to alight; that the plaintiff's wife being unable to understand or speak the English language, and ignorant of the fact that the train had run into a washout and was about to be wrecked, remained in the car in which she was riding; that after she had remained in the car about thirty minutes, and as she was attemp ing to leave her seat and ascertain the cause of the stopping of the train, the car in which she was riding suddenly, and without warning, fell, and was thrown from the track and roadbed and overturned, and she was injured; that the defendant company and its servants were guilty of gross negligence in stopping the train and the car in which the plaintiff's wife was riding, at the place where the track was out of order and liable to be washed out, without notifying her of this fact, and assisting her to dismount from the car, and leave her seat in the car, and go to a place of safety; that, after the car had been stopped, the defendant company and its servants knew that the plaintiff's wife was still in the car, and knew that the car was liable to be overturned and wrecked, and, knowing this, carelessly failed to notify her of the danger, or to remove her out thereof to a place of safety. The company pleaded the general issue, and for further answer specially alleged that if the plaintiff's wife was a passenger on its train at the time and place alleged in the petition, and was injured as therein alleged, which is not admitted, but denied, she sustained the injuries, not by reason of any fault or negligence on the part of the company or its servants in the operation of its train, but that the same was the act of God; that on or about July 19, 1899, while the defendant's train was approaching the bridge near Stanwix, the engineer operating the engine drawing the train discovered a wash-out, and water running over the bridge; that in the exercise of due care and caution the engineer began to back up the train to get out of danger, when suddenly and unexpectedly an extraordinary and unusual torrent of water, caused by a waterspout, struck the side of the railway track, thereby undermining the train, and causing the engine, baggage car, smoker, and day coach to overturn into the water; that the accident to the train was not caused by any fault of the defendant or its servants, nor was the same due to any defect in the construction of its track, but was caused by an unusual and unprecedented cloud-burst and rainfall, which caused the heavy torrent of water to rush from the hillside against and under the railway track; and that the injuries, if any, received by the plaintiff's wife were the result of an unavoidable accident. The court instructed the jury that, "under the facts of this case as developed by the undisputed testimony, the court feels constrained to charge you that the defendant is liable to the plaintiff for damages sustained, if you find from the testimony that Rosa Tar-in, the wife of the plaintiff, was injured in the accident about which the witnesses have testified." There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the company assigns that the court erred, to its prejudice, in instructing the jury as above recited.

The proof does not tend, in our view, to sustain the special defense made by the plaintiff in error. Taken as a whole, the defendant's testimony clearly shows that just before the train got to Stanwix the engineer discovered red lights of the work train closer to the switch, that there was an opening in the track, and that he ran down pretty close to that, and stopped, and the conductor went ahead to see what was wrong. When the conductor came back, they made an effort to back the train and get it into a safer place. Almost immediately thereupon the engine turned over, carrying with it one or more of the cars attached to it, but leaving the body of the train standing. The crew, with the help of the passengers began pushing the cars back, at which they were engaged for thirty or forty minutes. The conductor sent a brakeman through the train to notify the passengers and get them out. He did not speak Spanish, and the plaintiff's wife did not understand English. There was ample time to get all of the passengers out, and easy to get them to a place of safety. They all did get out, except the plaintiff's wife and one other, and none of those who got out was hurt. The dump on which the track was laid was only 2½ feet high. The train stood on it thirty or forty minutes, with the water running, not over it, but along one side of it, and washing the earth from under the ends of the ties, until this wash had so far advanced that the train turned over. No feature of a cloud-burst or of an excessive fall of rain, there or near, is shown by direct evidence, or by the effect of the water on the track. Some of the witnesses use those terms, but their testimony shows the impropriety of their use. The track was protected at this point by wings constructed to conduct the water to the culvert, where it could pass through. While the train was standing these wings became full, and the one nearest to the train gave away, and there was, of course, a rush of water from that giving away of the wing. But there is nothing in the testimony, when properly analyzed, to bring the occurrence within the defense attempted by the company.

We think the Circuit Court did not err in the charge given to the jury, and therefore its judgment is affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

v.

TOWNSHIP OF MISSION.

(46 C. C. A. 661, 107 Fed. 827.)

- *1. The power of a legislature to levy or to authorize the levy of a tax, and to create or authorize the creation of a public debt to be paid by taxation, is limited to its exercise for a public purpose.
- *2. The decision of the question whether a tax, or a public debt is for a public or private purpose is not a legislative, but a judicial, function. A legislature cannot make a private purpose a public purpose, or draw to itself or create the power to authorize a tax or a debt for such a purpose, by its mere fiat.
- *3. The promotion of the construction and operation of mills and factories to manufacture sorghum cane into sugar or syrup is a private, and not a public, purpose.
- *4. Township bonds issued for this purpose, and the act of March 1, 1889, authorizing their issue, are beyond the powers of the legislature and the township, and are void.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce payment of coupons cut from bonds issued by defendant. Affirmed.

Statement by SANBORN, Circuit Judge:

This is an action on 359 coupons cut from 22 township bonds issued by the township of Mission, in Shawnee county, in the state of Kansas, under an act of the legislature of that state passed on March 1, 1889, and entitled "An Act to Encourage the Erection of Mills and the Manufacture of Sugar and Syrup out of Sorghum Cane, and Authorizing Townships and Cities of the Second and Third Class to Subscribe for Stock in Sugar Factories, and to Vote Bonds Therefor." This act by its terms empowered any township or city named in its title to subscribe to capital stock of any incorporated company organized to erect and operate public mills or factories for the purpose of manufacturing sugar and syrup from sorghum cane upon a favorable vote of its electors, to issue its bonds to pay the subscription, and to levy taxes to pay the principal and interest of the bonds. It required every company and association which received the benefit of any bonds issued under it to retain 10 cents from the purchase price of every ton of sorghum cane which it bought for use in any mill, and to pay this sum over to the treasurer of the proper township, to be applied in payment of the bonds. It declared that all sugar mills which received aid under it were public mills, that they should manufacture sugar or syrup for customers who furnished cane, that they might charge toll therefor, that no factory should be required to receive more cane than it could manufacture into sugar or syrup, and that the amount of toll to be paid should be agreed upon between the company and the persons raising and delivering the cane prior to the time of planting the cane. Each bond contained the following recital: "This bond is one of a series of thirty bonds, of five hundred dollars each, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, issued by the township of Mission, of the county of Shawnee, in the state of Kansas, for the purpose of encouraging the erection of a public sugar mill, and the manufacture of sugar and syrup from sorghum cane, in the township of Mission, Shawnee county, Kansas, pursuant to and in accordance with the provisions and requirements of an act of the legislature of the state of Kansas for the year A. D. 1889, the same being an act entitled 'An Act to Encourage the Erection of Mills and the Manufacture of Sugar and Syrup out of Sorghum Cane, and Authorizing Townships and Cities of the Second and Third Class to Subscribe for Stock in Sugar Factories, and to Vote Bonds Therefor,' approved March 1, A. D. 1889. And it is hereby certified and recited that all acts, conditions, and things required to be done precedent to and in the issuing of said bonds have been properly done, happened, and performed in regular and due form as required by law." Each coupon contained the statement that it represented "interest on public sugar mill bond No. ———." The plaintiff in error, W. S. Dodge, filed a complaint in this action, in which he made the necessary jurisdictional allegations, and then averred that on September 15, 1890, the defendant in error, the township of Mission, issued and delivered 30

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

It is a fundamental principle of a republican form of government that no man shall be involuntarily deprived of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The prohibition of such a deprivation by the states is found in the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. But it lies deeper, and limits and conditions every grant of legislative, executive, or judicial authority. The proposition was announced in the early history of the Republic and it has been constantly affirmed. The Supreme Court said in Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, 388, 1 L. ed. 648, 649: "A law that punishes a citizen for an innocent action, or, in other words, for an act which, when done, was in violation of no existing law; a law that destroys or impairs the lawful private contracts of citizens; a law that makes a man a judge in his own cause; or a law that takes property from A. and gives it to B.,—it is against all reason and justice for a people to intrust a legislature with such powers, and therefore it cannot be presumed that they have done it."

A legislative act which takes, or undertakes to authorize the taking, of private property for a private object, either by taxation, or by the exercise of the power of eminent domain, or by any other means, is not a law, but an arbitrary decree, whereby the property of one citizen may be transferred to another. Such an act is beyond the limits of the powers granted by the people to the legislatures of the states, and is without legal force or effect. The legislative power of taxation and power of eminent domain are alike limited to the exercise thereof for public objects, and they cannot be successfully prostituted for private purposes. For the same reasons the power of a legislature to create or to authorize the creation of a public debt, and the issue of public bonds to be paid by taxation, is subject to the same limitation. The clear and forcible declarations of Chief Justice Black in 1853 in Sharpless v. Philadelphia, 21 Pa. 147, 169, 59 Am. Dec. 759, have long since become the settled law of the land. He said: "Neither has the legislature any constitutional right to create a public debt, or to lay a tax, or to authorize any municipal corporation to do it, in order to raise funds for a mere private purpose. No such authority passed to the assembly by the general grant of legislative power. This would not be legislation. Taxation is a mode of raising revenue for public purposes. When it is prostituted to objects in no way connected with the public interests or welfare, it ceases to be taxation, and becomes plunder. Transferring money from the owners of it into the possession of those who have no title to it, though it be done under the name and form of a tax, is unconstitutional for all the reasons which forbid the legislature to usurp any other power not granted to them." See also Cole v. La Grange, 113 U. S. 1, 6, 28 L. ed. 896, 897, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 416.

A necessary corollary to these propositions is that a legislature, which has no power to authorize the levy of a tax or the creation of a public debt for a private purpose, has no power to draw that authority to itself, or to create it by its mere declaration that a private purpose is a public one. Any other theory would destroy the limitation. A legislature cannot make a private purpose a public one by its mere fiat, and the determination of the question in any case whether or not a given object is public or private is a judicial, and is not a legislative, function. Allen v. Jay, 60 Me. 124, 139, 11 Am. Rep. 185; Tyler v. Beach, 44 Vt. 648, 651, 8 Am. Rep. 398; Re Eureka Basin Warehouse & Mfg. Co. 96 N. Y. 42, 47, 48.

If the bonds and coupons upon which this action is founded are ever paid, the money to discharge them must be raised by the levying of taxes upon private property situated in the township of Mission. Their validity, therefore, must depend upon the answer to the question whether they were issued for, and their proceeds were applied to, a public or a private purpose. They were issued to raise money to pay a subscription made by the township to the stock of a private corporation organized to erect and operate mills to make sugar and syrup from sorghum cane, and their proceeds were applied to that purpose. The question, then, is whether or not the construction and maintenance of factories owned by private corporations to manufacture sugar and syrup from sorghum cane is a public or a private purpose. The true answer to the question seems to be plain and certain. Speaking generally, a public purpose is a governmental purpose, one of the purposes for which governments are instituted and maintained among men, such as the maintenance of order, the prevention and punishment of crime, the care of highways, the relief of the destitute, the education of youth, the erection of buildings for the use of schools and of the officers of the government; while a private object is one which is ordinarily sought and attained by individuals or private associations of individuals, such as the cultivation of the soil, the manufacture of useful and attractive articles, the purchase and sale of merchandise, and the thousand and one purposes which enlist individual enterprise and energy in a complex and advancing civilization. There seems to be no doubt in which category the promotion of the construction and maintenance of sugar factories falls.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error, however, call attention to the settled rule that the promotion of the construction of railroads and of custom gristmills operated by water is a public purpose, in aid of which municipal corporations may lawfully issue bonds, and to the opinion of the Supreme Court in Burlington Twp. v. Beasley, 94 U. S. 310, 24 L. ed. 161, and insist that the aid of the construction of sugar mills is an analogous object, and therefore a public purpose. No argument is required to show that the erection of sugar mills, which directly benefit only those who own them, and which indirectly assist only those who raise sorghum cane, is no such public object as the construction of railroads, our chief means of transportation, whose rates are regulated by law, which may be used by every citizen for a reasonable compensation, and which are of universal benefit. In the case of Burlington Twp. v. Beasley the bonds under consideration were issued to aid in the construction of a custom gristmill propelled by steam, pursuant to an act of the legislature which authorized the township to emit them for the purpose of "building bridges, free or otherwise, or to aid in the construction of railroads or water power, by donation thereto or the taking of stock thereof, or for other works of internal improvement." The bonds did not show on their face for which one of the purposes named in the act they were sent forth, but simply recited that they were issued under this law. The court held in the first place, that if there was power in the township to issue the bonds under any circumstances they might be valid, and that as it was clear that such power existed to issue them for the public purpose of building bridges and constructing railroads, and there was nothing on the face of the bonds to vitiate them, they were good in the hands of innocent purchasers, and, in the second place, that the construction and maintenance of a custom gristmill propelled by steam was a work of internal improvement under this statute of Kansas, for which taxes might be levied to pay these bonds.

The decision in this case is not controlling upon the issues presented in the case at bar, because the bonds before us disclose the fact that they were issued for the purpose of encouraging the construction and operation of a public sugar mill, so that there can be no bona fide purchasers without notice of the object of their issue, and because the Burlington Twp. Case illustrates, not the general rule, but an exception to the well-established rule that the aid of private manufacturing or business enterprises is not a public purpose for which taxation may be imposed. This decision is the outgrowth of a more primitive state of society, when there were no railroads and few good highways, and when custom gristmills in the immediate neighborhoods of productive fields to grind grain for bread for the people and for food for the cattle were a public necessity. In this state of affairs a line of decisions was developed to the effect that aid in the construction and maintenance of custom gristmills driven by water, and the development of the necessary water power to propel them, was a public object, for which taxes might be lawfully levied upon the property of all the citizens. Guernsey v. Burlington Twp. 4 Dill. 375, Fed. Cas. No. 5,855; Harding v. Funk, 8 Kan. 315. The Burlington Twp. Case, perhaps, advanced another step, for the decision was that the promotion of a gristmill propelled by steam, as well as one propelled by water, was a public purpose. This proposition, however, together with the entire line of decisions upon which it rests, forms an exception to the general rule upon this subject, is inapplicable to the public needs and purposes of this day, and ought not to be enlarged. This view is sustained by the decisions of the supreme court, by reason, and by the great weight of authority. The Burlington Twp. Case was decided in 1876. Six years later, in 1882, in the case of Osborne v. Adams County, 106 U. S. 181, 27 L. ed. 129, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 168, the supreme court held, under an act which authorized the issue of bonds "to aid in the construction of any railroad or other work of internal improvement," that a gristmill propelled by steam was not a work of internal improvement, and that bonds issued to aid in its construction were void. In 1883 it cited this decision with approval, and held that gristmills propelled by water were works of internal improvement under the same statute, and that bonds issued to aid in the construction of a canal to conduct the water to such mills were issued for a public purpose, and were valid. Blair v. Cuming County, 111 U. S. 363, 372, 28 L. ed. 457, 460, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 449. These decisions show the narrow limits and sharp lines which confine this exception to the general rule.

When we turn from this line of decisions to the consideration of the nature of public aid in the construction and operation of other manufacturing plants of various kinds, the decisions of the Supreme Court voice no uncertain sound. In Citizens' Sav. & L. Asso. v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 655, 663, 22 L. ed. 455, 461, the legislature of Kansas had granted to the city council of Topeka the power "to encourage the establishment of manufactories and such other enterprises as may tend to develop and improve such city" and the authority to issue bonds for this purpose. The court held that this grant was beyond the limitations upon the power of the legislature which grew out of the essential nature of all free governments, and that bonds issued by a city to aid and encourage a manufacturing company in establishing and operating bridge shops in Topeka were emitted for a private purpose, and were void. In Parkersburg v. Brown, 106 U. S. 487, 491, 27 L. ed. 238, 240, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 442, the mayor and city council of Parkersburg had been authorized by the legislature of Virginia to issue the bonds of that city for the purpose of lending them to manufacturers carrying on business in or near the municipality, and the bonds had been issued. But the Supreme Court held that they were not sent forth for a public purpose, and were invalid. In Cole v. La Grange, 113 U. S. 1, 9, 28 L. ed. 896, 898, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 416, the legislature of the state of Missouri had granted to the city of La Grange the power to subscribe for stock in any manufacturing company and to issue bonds to pay the subscription. The city had delivered its bonds to a manufacturing company established for the purpose of operating a rolling mill, but the court held that the grant was ultra vires the legislature, that the object was private, and that the bonds were void.

The sugar factory, to aid in the construction of which these bonds were issued, was not to be constructed or operated by the township or its officers, but by private owners. The officers of the township were to have no control or direction of its management. It was not to be erected to perform, or to assist in the performance of, any function of government. All prosperous mercantile and manufacturing enterprises in a town tend to enhance the value of property, to employ labor, and to increase business. The fact that the construction and operation of this mill would have a similar effect in no way differentiates the purpose or object of its promotion from that of the promotion of other private business undertakings. If this attempt to promote the manufacture of sugar by taxation is to be sustained, every holder of property in this township must contribute a portion of that property to pay for the erection and operation of this mill. For what purpose must he make this contribution? Not to sustain the government, but to build a mill for private owners, in which they may conduct their own private business. Who receives the proceeds of these bonds? Or, in other words, to whom does the taxpayer really pay his tax? Not to the salaried officers of the government, not to the teachers of the children in the public schools, but to the private individuals who own the mills. For whose benefit does he contribute this share of his property? For the direct benefit of the owners of the mill alone, and perhaps for the indirect benefit of those farmers who contract with these owners before they plant their cane for its manufacture into sugar or syrup. When these facts are studiously considered, all doubt of the character of this promotion vanishes. The aid of the construction and operation of this mill actually serves but two purposes. It serves to enable the owners of the mill to gain the legitimate profits of their undertaking, and it serves to take by taxation from the owners of property in the township a portion of that property and to give it to the owners of the mill or to the promoters of the scheme for their private use. Neither of these objects is a public purpose. Neither of them is a purpose for which taxes can be lawfully levied, or for which municipal bonds may be legally issued. Our conclusion is that the promotion of the construction and operation of a mill for the manufacture of sorghum cane into sugar and syrup is not a public purpose. Township bonds issued for that purpose, and the act of the legislature which authorizes their issue, are alike beyond the powers of the legislature and of the township, and are void. Sharpless v. Philadelphia, 21 Pa. 147, 169, 59 Am. Dec. 759; Citizens' Sav. & L. Asso. v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 655, 661, 22 L. ed. 455, 460; Parkersburg v. Brown, 106 U. S. 487, 500, 27 L. ed. 238, 243, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 442; Osborne v. Adams County, 106 U. S. 181, 27 L. ed. 129, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 168; Cole v. La Grange, 113 U. S. 1, 7, 28 L. ed. 896, 898, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 416; Allen v. Jay, 60 Me. 124, 128, 11 Am. Rep. 185; Mead v. Acton, 139 Mass. 341, 1 N. E. 413; Michigan Sugar Co. v. Auditor General, 124 Mich. 174, 83 N. W. 625, 627; United States ex rel. Miles Planting & Mfg. Co. v. Carlisle, 5 App. D. C. 138, 146, 161; Deal v. Mississippi County, 107 Mo. 464, 468, 14 L. R. A. 622, 18 S. W. 24; Kingman v. Brocton, 153 Mass. 255, 11 L. R. A. 123, 26 N. E. 998; People v. Parks, 58 Cal. 624, 643; Atty. Gen. v. Eau Claire, 37 Wis. 400; *State ex rel. Griffith v. Y. 42, 47, 48; Coates v. Campbell, 37 Minn. 498, 499, 35 N. W. 366.

The argument of counsel for the plaintiff in error that the promotion of the construction and operation of this mill is a public purpose, because the legislature declared in the act authorizing the issue of the bonds that the mills aided thereby were public mills, and because the Supreme Court in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77, Budd v. People, 143 U. S. 517, 36 L. ed. 247, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 468, and Brass v. North Dakota ex rel. Stoesser, 153 U. S. 391, 38 L. ed. 757, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 670, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 857, held that the business of receiving and storing grain for compensation in elevators, warehouses, and docks might be declared by the legislature of the states to be of a public character, and might be regulated under their police power, has not been overlooked. But that contention cannot prevail, because the object of the promotion of this mill and of its operation was clearly private, and a legislature cannot by its mere fiat make a private object a public one for the purpose of taxation, and also because the limits of the power to tax are by no means the same as the limits of the police power of the states. Many private occupations, as the sale of intoxicants, the driving of carriages for hire, and the construction of private buildings along the streets of a city, bear such a relation to the public welfare that they may be regulated under the police power of a state, when there is an entire absence of power in its legislature to tax the property of its citizens to promote or maintain these enterprises.

The judgment below is affirmed.

NOTE.—On the question of the right to rescind or abandon a contract because of the other party's default, see Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Richards (Ill.) 30 L. R. A. 83, and note; also Worthington v. Gwin (Ala.) 43 L. R. A. 382. 54 L. R. A.

contract is made, its subject-matter, and the purpose of its execution are always material to determine the intention of the parties and the meaning of the terms they used, and when these are ascertained they must prevail over the dry words of the agreement.

2. Where one party to a contract has received and retained the benefits of a substantial partial performance thereof by the other party, he cannot rescind it, but the contract must stand, he must perform his part of it, and his remedy for the breach of complete performance by the other party is limited to compensation therefor in damages.
3. A party to a contract who has conferred upon the other party thereto the benefits of a substantial partial performance thereof, but who has not completely performed the agreement, may maintain an action against the other party for specific performance, or for damages for the latter's failure to perform, upon plea and proof of his own partial performance, without plea or proof of his complete performance; and the defendant in such an action may recoup his damages for the plaintiff's failure of complete performance, or may recover them in an independent action therefor.
4. The breach of a dependent covenant, a covenant which goes to the whole consideration of a contract, gives to the injured party the right to rescind the contract, or to treat it as broken and to recover damages for a total breach.
5. A breach of an independent covenant, of a covenant which does not go to the whole consideration of a contract, but which is subordinate and incidental to its main purpose, does not constitute a breach of the entire contract, or warrant its rescission by the injured party. The latter is still bound to perform his part of the contract, and his only remedy for the breach is compensation in damages.
6. Commercial contracts must be interpreted in the light of commercial usages, and their performance must be such as business men would naturally contemplate.
7. All that is ordinarily required of a party to a contract who has agreed to deliver personal property upon the payment of a debt or price is that he shall put the property in some convenient place, subject to the disposal of the payer upon his compliance with the terms of the contract, and that he shall notify the promisor of the fact.
8. Nine parties agreed to pay $35,000 and interest to A on or before a day certain, and A agreed to assign and deliver certain stock in a corporation to them when they paid the money. A deposited the stock in a bank in the city of St. Louis, where the contract was made, and more than forty days before the day certain caused the obligors to be notified that the stock was in the bank, subject to their disposition, upon their payment of their debt. Some of the nine parties resided and conducted business in St. Louis; others in Chicago. Held, this was a reasonable, fair, and sufficient offer of performance of his contract by A.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract. Reversed.

Statement by Sanborn, Circuit Judge:

This is an action on a contract. At the close of the evidence the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendants. The writ of error challenges the judgment which followed that verdict. The material facts established when the court directed the verdict were these: The plaintiff in error, John W. Kauffman, was in 1895 the owner of certain real estate in the city of St. Louis, Missouri, at the northwest corner of Ninth and Olive streets. On June 19, 1895, he made a lease of this property to the Central Realty & Improvement Company, a corporation, for a rental of $35,000 per annum, payable quarterly on August 1st, November 1st, February 1st, and May 1st in each year. In July, 1895, the Century Building Company, a corporation, was organized for the purpose of taking an assignment of this lease and constructing a building on these premises. On July 19, 1895, the lease was assigned to the Century Building Company, and that corporation assumed the payment of the rents reserved therein to the plaintiff, Kauffman. After the lease of June 19, 1895, had been made, the defendants in error and their associates, for the purpose of relieving the Century Building Company of the payment of the rent on this lease for one year, and of securing the payment and satisfaction of the first $35,000 payable upon this lease, made the following contract with John W. Kauffman:

This agreement, made and entered into in triplicate this 19th day of June, 1895, by and between John W. Kauffman, of the city of St. Louis, party of the first part, and Henry Raeder, Jonathan Clark, B. S. Crocker, and A. S. Coffin, of the city of Chicago, state of Illinois, and C. W. Wall, A. O. Rule, and R. F. Kilgen, of the city of St. Louis, state of Missouri, and the McCormick-Kilgen-Rule Real-Estate Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Missouri, of the city of St. Louis, state of Missouri, parties of the second part, witnesseth: That whereas, the said parties of the second part propose and intend to organize a corporation under the laws of the state of Missouri, and particularly under act March 21, 1891, of the general assembly of said state, with a capital stock of one million dollars ($1,000,000), six hundred thousand dollars ($600,000) of the same to be preferred and to draw a preferred dividend of six per cent (6%) per annum, said company to be known and styled the 'Century Building Company,' or such other name as may be hereafter agreed upon, said company to be organized for the purpose of acquiring a certain lease, dated the 19th day of June, 1895, entered into between said party of the first part and the Central Realty & Improvement Company, which lease covers certain premises in the city of St. Louis, at the northwest corner of Ninth and Olive streets, in said city, and to which lease reference is hereby made as part hereof, and also for the further purpose of erecting a building on such premises, including the premises covered by the Durning lease, referred to in said last-mentioned lease; and whereas, the said parties of the second part have requested, and do hereby request, the said party of the first part to accept and receive from said proposed corporation, or the said parties of the second part, in payment of four (4) instalments of rent provided for in said lease,—said four (4) instalments being respectively due August 1, 1895, the first day of November, 1895, the first day of February, 1896, and the first day of May, 1896, and aggregating thirty-five thousand dollars ($35,000) and being for eight thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars ($8,750) each,—three hundred and fifty (350) shares at par of the preferred capital stock of said proposed corporation, or thirty-five thousand dollars ($35,000), divided into four (4) instalments equal to said instalments of rent; and whereas, the said party of the first part has agreed to accept said shares of stock for said instalments of rent, at and upon the times they become due, upon the condition that the said parties of the second part agree, on or before the 1st day of July, 1896, to purchase said shares of preferred stock from said party of the first part, at and for the price of thirty-five thousand dollars ($35,000), and in addition thereto an amount equal to interest at the rate of six per cent (6%) per annum on the said several instalments of rent from the time they become severally due and payable, less any dividend which the said party of the first part may have received on account of said preferred stock: Now therefore, the said parties of the second part do hereby agree and bind themselves to purchase said preferred stock from said party of the first part, as hereinbefore recited, and to pay therefor the price hereinbefore set forth; and the said party of the first part agrees to sell and transfer to said parties of the second part the said stock at the times and for the price hereinbefore set forth. This contract shall be binding on the said parties, respectively, and as well their respective heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns.

In witness whereof, the said parties have hereunto set their hands the day and year first hereinbefore written.

Kauffman satisfied the debt and discharged the lessee and its assignee from their liability for the $35,000 rent which fell due on and before the 1st day of May, 1896, and took the 350 shares of the preferred capital stock of the Century Building Company according to his covenant in this agreement. Some time in 1897 he assigned this stock and delivered the agreement to the Merchants-Laclede National Bank, a corporation engaged in a general banking business in the city of St. Louis, Missouri, as collateral security for an indebtedness which he owed the bank. In September, 1898, he paid his debt to the bank, and redeemed and recovered possession of the certificates and the agreement. During all the time between the execution of the agreement and the trial of this action the stock and the agreement have been under his control, and he has been able, willing, and ready to assign and deliver them to the defendants, upon their payment of the $35,000 and interest, pursuant to the terms of their agreement. On May 16, 1898, he caused the cashier of the Merchants-Laclede National Bank to send the following letter to each of the obligors in this agreement to pay the $35,000, and each of them received the letter in the ordinary course of the mail:

Dear Sir: As collateral security to a loan made to John W. Kauffman, we hold 350 shares of the preferred stock of the Century Building Co., together with an agreement, signed by you and others, agreeing to pay for said stock $35,000, with interest, amounting to $4,313.74 to July 1st next, the maturity of the agreement. We desire to notify you that we hold the stock and agreement, and to request you to arrange to take up your agreement on the date named, namely, July 1st, 1898. Yours, truly, [Signed] George E. Hoffman, Cashier.

On July 18, 1898, the attorneys for Mr. Kauffman wrote to the defendant Jonathan Clark that the contract had not been performed on his part, that Mr. Kauffman proposed to take immediate measures to enforce his rights as defined in the agreement, and asked him to advise them if it would be necessary for them to resort to the courts to assert the rights of their client. Three days later Mr. Clark answered that he was ready at any time to perform his part of the contract, that he supposed that if legal action was necessary to collect the claim that action must be taken against all the parties to the contract, so that it would be of no avail for him to pay his proportion of the amount due, but that if Mr. Kauffman would accept the proposition he would pay him $5,000 and permit him to retain his proportion of the stock, provided he would release the writer from any further obligation on the contract. In October, 1898, one of the attorneys of the plaintiff in error again demanded of Mr. Clark the payment of the amount owing upon the contract, and he declined to pay or take any further action in the matter, and waived a tender or production of the certificates of stock and their assignment. He declared that he did not intend to do anything about performing the contract, and that it would make no difference in his decision if the certificates of stock were presented. Upon this state of facts the court below directed a verdict for the defendants on the sole ground that no tender or offer of the certificates of stock and an assignment thereof to the defendants was made by the plaintiff or waived by the defendants on or before July 1, 1898, although it was conceded that they were in the control of the plaintiff, who was ready and willing to transfer them during this time, and that within four months after July 1, 1898, a proper demand of performance was made of the defendant Clark, and he refused to perform and waived the production and offer of the certificates and assignment.

A man bound to pay has no right to delay till demand is made, but must pay as soon as the money is due, under peril of being sued; and it has already been stated that the vendor, in the absence of a stipulation to the contrary, is not bound to send or carry the goods, or to allege or prove, in an action against the buyer, anything more than a readiness and willingness to deliver.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

May one party to a contract, who has accepted and retained the benefits of its substantial performance by the other party, retain and enjoy these benefits, and still rescind the agreement, and escape all the burdens and liabilities of the contract, because the first party has failed to perform at the exact time stipulated therein a subordinate covenant, incidental to the main purpose of the agreement, which goes only to a part of the consideration, and whose breach may be compensated by damages? This is the most important question which this case presents. It will be conducive to brevity and perspicuity to obtain a clear idea of the relations of the parties to the agreement to be considered, their respective covenants therein, and the moving considerations which induced them to make their stipulations, before entering upon the discussion of this issue. This conception must be secured by the light of the fundamental rule that the situation of the parties when the contract was made, its subject-matter, and the purpose of its execution are material to determine the intention of the parties and the meaning of the terms they used, and that when these are ascertained they must prevail over the dry words of the stipulations. Accumulator Co. v. Dubuque Street R. Co. 12 C. C. A. 37, 41, 42, 27 U. S. App. 364, 372, 64 Fed. 70, 74; Salt Lake City v. Smith, 43 C. C. A. 637, 104 Fed. 457, 462.

On June 19, 1895, when this agreement was made, the plaintiff, John W. Kauffman, had made a lease of the valuable premises in the heart of the city of St. Louis involved in the negotiation to the Central Realty & Improvement Company for a term of years, whereby he was secured—First, by his legal right to eject the lessee and to take back the premises upon default in the payment of any instalment of the rent; and, second, by the covenant of the lessee, in the receipt during the year then ensuing of a rent of $35,000 in quarterly payments. The defendants had formed the project of organizing a corporation, the Century Building Company, of purchasing this lease from the lessee, of assuming its covenants, and of constructing a building on the leased premises in the name of this prospective corporation. They could derive no rents or income from the premises during the year then ensuing, while the building was in course of construction, and they desired to carry the time of payment of this $35,000 forward to a period when the building would be completed and the property would be yielding an income. For this purpose they induced the plaintiff to make the contract under consideration. In this agreement the plaintiff and the defendants made certain covenants with each other. By the dry words of the contract the plaintiff covenanted to accept preferred stock of the Century Company at its par value for the $35,000 rent which was coming due in the then ensuing year, and to assign and transfer this stock to the defendants and their associates for $35,000 and interest thereon at 6 per cent per annum from the time that the rent fell due by the terms of the lease. On the other hand, the defendants covenanted to pay this $35,000 and interest to the plaintiff on or before July 1, 1898. The legal effect, the real meaning, of the agreement was that Kauffman covenanted to release (1) the security of his right to eject the lessee and its assignee, and to recover back the premises, for a failure to pay any instalment of his rent, and (2) the security of his lessee's agreement to pay it, and to accept in lieu of this security the personal covenant of the defendants that they would pay the rent, with interest, on or before July 1, 1898, and the preferred stock of the prospective corporation, which he agreed to hold and to deliver to the defendants upon their performance of their covenant to pay the rent. The considerations which Kauffman agreed to give to the defendants for their covenant to pay the rent and interest were (1) the use by the prospective corporation of the leased premises for a year without the payment of any rent; (2) the release of the premises from Kauffman's right to retake them for the failure to pay any instalment of this rent; (3) the release of the realty company and of its proposed assignee, the Century Company, from liability to pay this rent; and (4) the assignment and transfer of the 350 shares of stock. The single consideration which the defendants agreed to give to the plaintiff for all these covenants was the payment of the $35,000 and interest on or before July 1, 1898. Thus it will be seen that the main purpose of the contract was the novation, the release by the plaintiff of the leased premises, of the lessee and of its proposed assignee from liability for the rent, and the covenant of the defendants to pay it with interest. The desideratum which induced the agreement and which went to the whole consideration of both sides was this novation. Without that the contract would never have been made. The covenant of Kauffman to take, to hold, and to assign and transfer the stock to the defendants was subordinate and incidental to the main purpose of the agreement, never induced its making, and went only to a part of the consideration. It was not their prospective procurement of this stock that induced the defendants to promise to pay the $35,000 and interest, but it was the use of the premises by their corporation without the payment of rent for a year, and the release of the leased premises of the lessee, and of its proposed assignee from liability for this payment. They contemplated organizing the proposed corporation and issuing its stock themselves, and they were not hiring strangers to purchase this stock for them. Nor was it the prospective acquisition of this stock, which this contract compelled Kauffman to hold in trust and to transfer to the defendants, that induced the plaintiff to agree to release his property, his lessee, and its proposed assignee from liability for the rent; but it was the personal covenant of the defendants to pay it. The plaintiff was not desirous of purchasing the stock, but the defendants, by means of their covenant to pay the rent and interest, hired him to accept and hold it until they paid it. The terms of the agreement are not conditioned by either the market price or the agreed value of the stock as in a contract of sale, but solely by the amount of the rent and the interest upon it. Thus the situation of the parties when the contract was made, the ends they sought to attain, and the very terms of the agreement compel the conclusion that its main purpose was the novation, that the stipulation concerning the stock went only to a part of the consideration and was subordinate and incidental to this purpose, while the covenants which went to the whole consideration of the agreement, those which actually induced the contract, were, on the one hand, the promise of the plaintiff to release the property, the lessee, and its assignee from liability for the rent, and, on the other, the covenant of the defendants to pay it, with interest, on or before July 1, 1898.

Now the plaintiff has performed the substantial parts of his covenants, and the defendants have accepted and retained the substantial benefits which they sought to secure by the performance of his covenants, while they have refused to perform any portion of their own. The plaintiff has released his property, his lessee, and its assignee, the Century Company, from liability for the $35,000 rent, has furnished the use of his property to the defendants' corporation for a year without the payment of any rent, has accepted and held the preferred stock from 1896 until the present time, and has offered and still offers to assign and deliver it to the defendants, as he agreed to do. The defendants have accepted, enjoyed, and still retain the use of the leased premises by their corporation during that year without the payment of rent, and the release of the property, of the lessee, and of its assignee from liability for this $35,000. They have received and retained the great desiderata which induced them to make their promise, and yet they refuse to pay a dollar for these benefits, and insist that they are absolved from all liability because the plaintiff did not offer to assign and deliver the stock to them in accordance with every legal technicality on the very day when their obligation matured, although he was always ready and willing, and within four months thereafter he offered, to do so in compliance with every requirement of the law which the defendants did not waive. Can a party to a contract retain all the benefits of a substantial performance of it by the other party, and then escape all its burdens and repudiate all his obligations by means of such a technicality as this? There are two principles of law which forbid such a manifest injustice and compel a negative answer to this question. This issue will be considered and discussed on the assumption that the defendants' theory of this case is sustained by the facts,—on the assumption that the plaintiff made no sufficient offer to assign or deliver the stock until after July 1, 1898, and that his failure to make this offer was never waived by the defendants. The evidence, however, is conclusive that within four months after that date an adequate offer on the part of the plaintiff to complete his performance of the agreement was made, and still the defendants refused to pay any part of the $35,000 and interest.

One of the rules of law which compels a negative answer to the question now under consideration is that when a contract has been partially executed, and one of the parties has derived substantial benefits or has imposed upon the other material losses through the latter's partial performance of the agreement, then the first party cannot rescind the contract on account of the failure of the second party to complete his performance, but the agreement must stand, the first party must perform his part of it, and his only remedy for the failure of the second party to completely perform is compensation in damages for that breach. German Sav. Inst. v. De La Vergne Refrigerating Mach. Co. 17 C. C. A. 34, 38, 36 U. S. App. 184, 190, 70 Fed. 146, 150; 1 Chitty, Pl. 16th Am. ed. *333; Barbee v. Willard, 4 McLean, 356, 359, Fed. Cas. Wheeling Steel Works*, 3 C. C. A. 600, 3 U. S. App. 358, 53 Fed. 494, 499; Voorhees v. Earl, 2 Hill, 288, 294, 38 Am. Dec. 588; Barnett v. Stanton, 2 Ala. 181; Churchill v. Holton, 38 Minn. 519, 38 N. W. 611; Treadwell v. Reynolds, 39 Conn. 31; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 557, note 2. It is only when the parties to the agreement can be placed in statu quo that one may rescind or repudiate the entire contract for the failure of the other to perform it. When one party has received the benefits of substantial performance by the other without paying for them the price agreed on, and he cannot or does not return these benefits, it is manifestly unjust to permit him to retain them without paying or doing as he promised to pay or do on account of his receipt of them. In order to avoid such an injustice, the party who has substantially performed may enforce specific performance of the covenants of the other party, or may recover damages for their breach without plea or proof of complete performance, while the defendant, on the other hand, may recover by counterclaim or by an independent action the damages which he has sustained from the plaintiff's failure to completely fulfil his covenants. This rule is settled. In German Sav. Inst. v. De La Vergne Refrigerating Mach. Co. 17 C. C. A. 34, 38, 36 U. S. App. 184, 190, 70 Fed. 146, 150, this court considered its reason, its justice, and its application to cases of the nature of that now in hand at considerable length, cited many authorities in its support, reviewed some decisions that illustrate it, and, without repeating that discussion here, we content ourselves with a reference to the opinion in that case, and with the following apt and terse statement of the rule and its reason from 1 Chitty, Pl. 16th Am. ed. *333: "Where the plaintiff's covenant or stipulation constituted only a part of the consideration of the defendant's contract, and the defendant has actually received a partial benefit, and the breach on the part of the plaintiff might be compensated in damages, an action may be supported against the defendant, without averring performance by the plaintiff; for, where a party has received a part of the consideration for his agreement, it would be unjust that, because he had not had the whole, he should enjoy that part without paying or doing anything for it, and therefore the law obliges him to perform the agreement on his part, and leaves him to his remedy to recover any damage he may have sustained in not having received the whole consideration."

An application of this rule to this case will not permit the injustice of allowing the defendants to deprive the plaintiff of the $35,000 rent and interest which is justly his due, while it will enable them to reduce his recovery by the amount of any damages which they sustained because the plaintiff did not legally offer them the assignment and delivery of the stock on July 1, 1898, when they ought to have paid and he ought to have delivered the stock. The case falls far within the rule. The covenant on account of the technical breach of which the defendants sought to repudiate all liability—the covenant to assign and deliver the stock to them—was a part, and only a small part, of the consideration of their covenant to pay the rent and interest. The largest part of the consideration, nay, the real consideration, for that covenant, was the use of the leased premises by their corporation for a year without the payment of rent, and the release of the land, of the lessee, and of its assignee, from liability therefor. This moving consideration the defendants have received, and they have thus derived, not only a partial benefit, but all the substantial benefits of a performance of the contract. The record does not disclose the market value of the stock, or whether or not it ever had any actual value, and the only intimation upon the subject is that one of the nine parties who were bound to pay the $35,000 and interest offered the plaintiff $5,000 and his share of the stock to release him from his liability under the agreement. The breach by the plaintiff of his contract to deliver the stock on July 1, 1898, can be readily compensated in damages. Those damages are simply the diminution in the market value of the stock between July 1, 1898, and the day in October when it is certain that a sufficient offer to assign and deliver it was made. The rule which we have been considering prohibits the defendants from retaining the benefits of the substantial performance of this contract by the plaintiff, and then escaping all its substantial burdens on account of his technical failure to offer them the stock on the day when they agreed, but failed, to pay him the $35,000 and interest, and its application to this case will prevent injustice and work no wrong or inequity to any of the parties to this agreement.

There is another principle of law which equally prohibits the maintenance of the theory of the defendants in this case. It is stated by Lord Mansfield in Boone v. Eyre 1 H. Bl. 273, note 1, in these words: "Where mutual covenants go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, the one precedent to the other; but where they only go to a part, where a breach may be paid for in damages, there the defendant has a remedy on his covenant, and shall not plead it as a condition precedent." Ritchie v. Atkinson, 10 East, 295; Stavers v. Curling, 3 Bing. N. C. 355; Lowber v. Bangs, 2 Wall. 728, 736, 17 L. ed. 768, 769; Hague v. Ahrens, 3 C. C. A. 426, 3 U. S. App. 231, 53 Fed. 58.

The breach of a covenant of the first class—a dependent covenant, one which goes to the whole consideration of the contract—gives to the injured party the right to treat the entire contract as broken, and to recover damages for a total breach. Leopold v. Salkey, 89 Ill. 412, 31 Am. Rep. 93; Keck v. Bieber, 148 Pa. 645, 24 Atl. 170; Parker v. Russell, 133 Mass. 74; Grand Rapids & B. City R. Co. v. Van Dusen, 29 Mich. 431; Richmond v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. 40 Iowa, 264, 275. But a breach of a covenant of the second class, an independent covenant, a covenant which does not go to the whole consideration of the contract and is subordinate and incidental to its main purpose, does not constitute a breach of the entire contract, does not authorize the injured party to rescind the agreement, but he is still bound to perform his part of it, and his only remedy is a recovery of damages for the breach. Union P. R. Co. v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 28 C. C. A. 1, 4, 49 U. S. App. 752, 759, 83 Fed. 676, 679; Pordage v. Cole, 1 Wms. Saund. 320, note; Campbell v. Jones, 6 T. R. 570, 573; Surplice v. Farnsworth, 7 Mann. & G. 576, 584; Obermyer v.

Nichols, 6 Binn. 159, 160, 164, 6 Am. Dec. 439; Burnes v. McCubbin, 3 Kan. 221, 226, 87 Am. Dec. 468; Butler v. Manny, 52 Mo. 497, 506; Turner v. Mellier, 59 Mo. 527, 530; Pepper v. Haight, 20 Barb. 429, 440; Central Appalachian Co. v. Buchanan, 20 C. C. A. 33, 43 U. S. App. 265, 73 Fed. 1007. Now, the covenant of the plaintiff to assign and transfer the stock to the defendants did not go to the whole consideration of the contract, but was subordinate and incidental to its main purpose, as has already been shown. Its breach was susceptible of compensation in damages. Therefore, even though the plaintiff committed a technical breach of it, the defendants, who had accomplished the main purpose of their contract, and had accepted the benefits of the plaintiff's performance of that part of his covenants which went to the whole consideration of the agreement, the use of the leased premises by their corporation for a year without payment of the rent, and the release of the premises, of the lessee, and of its assignee from liability therefor, were still bound by their agreement to pay this rent and interest, and their only remedy for the plaintiff's breach was compensation in damages.

The application of the two rules which have now been considered to the trial of this case will eventuate in a fair, just, and equitable result. The plaintiff will receive the rent and interest which the defendants agreed to pay him, less any damages which the defendants have sustained by the diminution in the market value of the stock between July 1, 1898, when he should have offered to assign and deliver it, and the day thereafter when he did make a sufficient offer to do so. The defendants will receive the stock which the plaintiff agreed to hold and to assign and to deliver to them, and they will pay the $35,000 and interest, less any damages they sustained by the failure of the plaintiff to make his offer to complete the performance of his agreement in time. The manifest justice and equity of this result vindicate the purpose and the wisdom of the principles of law which compel it, and commend them to the reason and the judgment.

Counsel for defendants in error have cited and discussed a large number of decisions which illustrate established and salutary rules of law that properly govern the cases in which those decisions were rendered, but which are inapplicable to the case at bar. One class of these decisions is well represented by Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 29 L. ed. 366, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 12; Bowes v. Shand, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 467, 468; Bordenave v. Gregory, 5 East, 107; Bank of Columbia v. Hagner, 1 Pet. 455, 7 L. ed. 219; Telfener v. Russ, 162 U. S. 170, 40 L. ed. 930, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 695, and Kelley v. Upton, 5 Duer, 336. The opinions in these cases relate to the performance of executory contracts of sale, under which the defendants had received no benefits from partial performance by the plaintiffs for which they had not paid; and it is there properly held that without performance or offer of performance at the date by the plaintiffs they could not maintain actions, upon the principle, already adverted to, that where the plaintiff defaults and the parties can be put in statu quo the defendant may rescind. The distinction between these cases and the case in hand is that the defendants in the former had not received and retained any benefits derived from the partial performance by the plaintiffs for which they had not paid the contract price, and the covenants which the plaintiffs had failed to perform were dependent covenants, which went to the whole consideration of the contract, while the defendants in this case have received and enjoyed the benefits of a substantial performance by the plaintiff without paying the agreed consideration therefor, and the covenant of which the plaintiff has committed a technical breach is a subordinate, independent covenant, incidental to the chief object of the agreement, and his breach may be readily compensated in damages. This distinction is noted by Mr. Justice Gray in his opinion in Norrington v. Wright, where he says: "This case wholly differs from that of Lyon v. Bertram, 20 How. 149, 15 L. ed. 847, in which the buyer of a specific lot of goods accepted and used part of them with full means of previously ascertaining whether they conformed to the contract." 115 U. S. 188, 205, 29 L. ed. 366, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 12.

It is clearly pointed out by this court in German Sav. Inst. v. De La Vergne Refrigerating Mach. Co. 17 C. C. A. 34, 36 U. S. App. 184, 70 Fed. 154, and by the circuit court of appeals in the third circuit in Clark v. Wheeling Steel Works, 3 C. C. A. 600, 603, 3 U. S. App. 358, 364, 53 Fed. 494, 498, in these words: "If the defendants in Norrington v. Wright had retained and used the railroad iron delivered to them after they had discovered the seller's failure to ship the stipulated quantities in February and March, they would not have been justified in rescinding their contract."

Another class of authorities upon which counsel for the defendants rely is illustrated by Waterman v. Banks, 144 U. S. 394, 403, 36 L. ed. 479, 482, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 646; Keasey v. Crouther, 162 U. S. 404, 408, 40 L. ed. 1017, 1019, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 808; Doloret v. Rothschild, 1 Sim. & Stu. 590; and Henderson v. Wheaton, 139 Ill. 581, 28 N. E. 1100. These are cases upon option contracts, upon agreements in which the liability of the parties on one side is not fixed by the covenants in the contracts at the time they are signed, but they simply agree that they will become liable to do certain acts or to pay certain moneys if within fixed times the parties upon the other side of the contracts choose to give certain notices or to do certain acts. They are governed by the indisputable rule that time is of the essence of such an offer to make an agreement, and that unless he who has the option to fix the liability of the opposite party to the contract exercises it, and does the act or gives the notice prescribed to evidence his choice in the time and manner specified in the contract, the liability never comes into being, and no action can be maintained upon it. The rule upon this subject which has received the sanction of the Supreme Court is stated in Waterman v. Banks, 144 U. S. 394, 403, 36 L. ed. 479, 483, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 646. It is, in brief, that, where one agrees to sell and deliver, and another agrees to buy and pay for, property on a certain day, time is not of the essence of the contract, and the fact that the day fixed passes without payment or delivery, or offer to do either, will not entitle either party to refuse to complete it; but that, when one party to a contract agrees to do some act if the other chooses to give a specified notice or to perform a specified deed or act within a time certain, there time is of the essence of the contract, and a failure to give the notice or do the act prevents the creation of the liability, because the contract in its inception is a mere offer to become liable on certain terms, and, if the offer is not accepted, of course no liability is created. Cases of this character have no bearing on the questions at issue in this case (1) because the defendants in them have not received the benefits of a partial performance of the covenants of the plaintiff, (2) because the options which the plaintiffs failed to exercise went to the entire considerations of the contracts, while the covenant which the plaintiff has broken goes only to a part of the consideration of this agreement, and (3) because in those cases the parties upon one side of the contracts were by the terms of their agreements given the choice of creating or refusing to create the liability of the parties upon the other side of the contracts, by certain prescribed acts which they might do after the contracts were made, while in the case at bar neither the plaintiff nor the defendants secured any such option. The moment this contract was made all the rights and all the liabilities of the parties to it were irrevocably fixed by the covenants it contained. The plaintiff agreed absolutely to release the leased premises, the lessee, and its assignee from liability for rent for the year 1895-96, to take the preferred stock, and to assign and deliver it to the defendants. The defendants covenanted unconditionally to pay the rent and interest on or before July 1, 1898. One who undertakes by a promissory note to pay a sum of money on or before a certain day makes as absolute a contract to pay it as when he agrees to make his payment on a day certain. When the parties to this agreement had signed and delivered it, their rights and liabilities under it were absolutely fixed. Neither party had any choice or option to fulfil or accept the fulfilment of any covenant in the agreement. Either party could maintain an action for the breach of any covenant made by the other, and no choice or option of liability was left to either. The decisions upon option contracts have no relevancy to the issue presented in this case, and they are here dismissed.

Cases have also been cited in which by the express terms of the contract time is made of the essence of the agreement, as in Shinn v. Roberts, 20 N. J. L. 435, 43 Am. Dec. 636, where there was an express stipulation that the deed should be ready on a day certain at 10 A. M., and that if the vendee did not pay the price at that time he forfeited all his rights under the contract of purchase. Other cases have been reviewed in which by express stipulation the fulfillment of one covenant was made a condition precedent to the performance of another, as in Washington v. Ogden, 1 Black, 450, 458, sub nom. Turner v. Ogden, 17 L. ed. 203, 206, where the entire agreement was made "dependent on the surrender and cancellation of said contract with said Wright" within the sixty days limited for its performance. In these cases the courts properly held, in the one case that performance or an offer to perform, and in the other that surrender or cancellation of the contract with Wright, was indispensable to the enforcement of the agreement. But decisions of this character are irrelevant to the questions here in hand, because there are no express stipulations in the agreement in suit that time shall be the essence of the contract, or that the performance of any act or the fulfillment of any covenant shall be a condition precedent to the exercise or to the fulfillment of any other, because in those cases the defendants had not received and retained the benefits of a partial performance by the plaintiffs, and because the covenants there broken were dependent covenants which went to the whole consideration of the contract.

A large number of cases have been discussed which simply hold that, before a party to mutual dependent covenants which are to be performed at the same time can maintain an action for the breach, he must perform or offer to perform his part of them, unless the offer is waived by the other party to the contract. Bailey v. Lay, 18 Colo. 405, 33 Pac. 407; Thorpe v. Thorpe, 1 Salk. 171; Hill v. Grigsby, 35 Cal. 666; Ackley v. Richman, 10 N. J. L. 305; Barbee v. Wilford, 4 McLean, 356, Fed. Cas. No. 969; Johnson v. Wygant, 11 Wend. 48; Summers v. Sleeth, 45 Ind. 598; Frey v. Johnson, 22 How. Pr. 316, 325. But none of these decisions hold that a failure of one party to perform or to offer to perform on the day fixed releases the other party from his obligation to fulfil his covenants. But one of them discusses the question whether it is necessary for one who has partially performed his covenants to the other to allege complete performance or offer to perform in order to maintain his action, and in that case (4 McLean, 356, Fed. Cas. No. 969) the court cites Chitty, Pl. *333, and declares that the true doctrine undoubtedly is that he is not required to do so. Moreover, the question these cases presented is immaterial to a decision of this case, because the fact is clearly established by the evidence and conceded by counsel for the defendants that a sufficient offer of complete performance was made by the plaintiff before this action was commenced.

This brief review of the leading cases upon which defendants' counsel rely will serve to show why they do not convince us that their clients ought not to be permitted to retain the plaintiff's substantial performance of his agreement and to entirely escape from its burdens. None of the decisions they cite were conditioned by such a partial performance, by the receipt and retention by the defendants of the benefits of the plaintiff's substantial performance, or by so slight a technical breach of a covenant so subordinate and incidental to the main purpose of the contract as those in the case at bar; and the principles of law which controlled the cases upon which they rely are irrelevant to the issues in this case, and, if applied, would work a great and manifest wrong. The facts of this case bring it squarely under the salutary rules that (1) when a covenant goes only to a part of the consideration of a contract, is incidental and subordinate to its main purpose, and its breach may be compensated in damages, such a breach does not warrant a rescission of the contract, but the injured party is still bound to perform his part of the agreement, and his only remedy for the breach consists of the damages he has suffered therefrom, and (2) where one party to a contract has received and retained the benefits of a substantial partial performance of the agreement by the other party, who has failed to completely fulfil all his covenants, the first party cannot retain the benefits and repudiate the burdens of the contract, but he is bound to perform his part of the agreement, and his remedy for the breach is limited to compensation in damages. The first party, upon plea and proof of his substantial partial performance, and without plea or proof of his complete performance, may maintain an action either for specific performance or for damages on account of the failure of the second party to perform, and the latter may secure his damages for the plaintiff's breach either by counterclaim or by an independent action. The failure of the court below to try this case in accordance with these established principles of the law necessitates a reversal of the judgment in favor of the defendants and another trial of this case.

The conclusion which has been reached renders it unnecessary to consider many of the questions which were presented and argued at the hearing of this case. It is based on the assumption that the plaintiff made no sufficient offer to assign and deliver the stock on July 1, 1898, when the defendants were bound to pay their debt. Counsel for the plaintiff in error insists that this assumption is not well founded in fact or in law, and this question will now be briefly considered. On May 16, 1896, the plaintiff caused the cashier of the bank which held the stock and the contract as collateral to a loan which it had made to him to notify each of the obligors in the covenant to pay him the $35,000 and interest, that the bank held this stock and agreement as collateral security, and to request each of them to take them up pursuant to their covenant. This notice was susceptible of but one meaning, and that was that the stock and the agreement were in the bank, which was situated in the city of St. Louis, subject to the disposition of the obligors in the contract, upon their payment of the $35,000 and interest. It is contended by the defendants that the law required the plaintiff to seek out each of the defendants at his residence or place of business, and tender or offer him the stock on July 1, 1898, or to suffer the penalty of a default in the performance of his obligation. There are authorities which sustain this contention, but they are inapplicable to the facts and circumstances of this case. The law never requires the unreasonable, the impracticable, or the impossible. There were nine obligors in this covenant to pay the $35,000 and interest. There were nine different parties who were entitled to receive this stock upon the payment of this money. Their contract was to pay it on or before July 1, 1898. Some of them resided and were engaged in business in Chicago. Some resided and were engaged in business occupations in St. Louis. The cities are more than 300 miles apart. Each one of these obligors had the right under his contract to wait until the last moment of the business day of July 1, 1898, before he was called upon by the agreement to pay the debt. If the contract required the plaintiff to search out each of these obligors at his residence or place of business, and to tender him the stock on the last moment allowed him to pay the debt, in order to hold him liable upon his obligation, then its performance by the plaintiff was clearly impossible. It is said that if this is true it is the fault of the contract and the misfortune of the plaintiff, and that the court cannot make a new contract for the parties. But the defect is not in the contract, but in its interpretation. It is the failure to apply to its construction the familiar rule that that interpretation which sustains and vitalizes an agreement, rather than that which paralyzes and destroys it, must be adopted. There is also a settled legal presumption, which conditions the interpretation of the contract and the intention of the parties to it, which should not be ignored. It is that they must have intended to make a valid and practicable contract, not one that was void or that could not be performed, and that, if there is any rational interpretation of the agreement which will render its performance practicable, that construction should prevail. Moreover, the parties to this agreement were not farmers or ranchmen, but they were business men, residing in great commercial cities, familiar with and practising commercial usages. Now, let the contract be read in the light of these rules and presumptions, and in the light of the situation and knowledge of the parties when they signed it, and let us see how they intended that it should be performed. The subject-matter of the contract was in the city of St. Louis. The agreement was made, and was presumably to be performed, in that city. The creditor, Kauffman, and a part of the debtors, resided in St. Louis, while the remainder were residents of the city of Chicago, more than 300 miles distant. The parties to the agreement were men engaged in business in large cities. Such men are not accustomed to transact their business, to make the delivery of personal property, or to pay their debts at their places of residence. They ordinarily conduct such transactions at convenient banks, in offices, or in shops during the business hours of the day. These debtors knew all these things when they made this agreement, and they also knew that it was impossible for their creditor to search out and tender this stock to each one of them on the last moment of the business day in such a way as to charge more than one of them, and yet each and all of them promised to pay this debt, and they intended to perform that promise and to make a valid and practicable agreement. The conclusion is irresistible that they never intended to require, and Kauffman never intended to agree to make, any tender or delivery of the stock to each one of them at their several places of residence or of business on the day when they agreed to pay the debt. The conclusion is irresistible that all they intended to require, and all that Kauffman agreed to do, was that he should make such a reasonable delivery, or such a reasonable and practicable offer to deliver the stock, as business men under such circumstances would naturally contemplate. The vendor of personal property is not ordinarily required to carry it to the vendee and there to tender it to him, and the reason is that such a requirement is unnecessary and unreasonable. It would have been far more unnecessary and unreasonable to have required the plaintiff to search out each one of these nine debtors and to tender or offer to deliver to them the stock on the last moment of the business day of July 1, 1898, and the contract called for no such performance.

Commercial agreements must be interpreted in the light of commercial usages, of reason, and of justice. It must be presumed that the intention of the parties to them regarding their performance, as well as their terms, is reasonable, fair, and practicable; and where a commercial contract between business men requires personal property, such as certificates of stock in a corporation, to be delivered to several parties at the same time that it requires them to pay a sum certain to the holder of the stock, and no place of delivery is named in the agreement, a deposit of the property in a convenient business institution in the city in which the contract was made, in which its subject-matter was situated, and in which it was presumably to be performed, and a timely notice to the debtors that it has been so deposited, is a fair, reasonable, and sufficient tender and offer of delivery by the holder of the property. Benjamin, Sales, §§ 679, 707; Tiedeman, Sales, §§ 94, 96, 207; Carpenter v. Holcomb, 105 Mass. 280, 284;

Wilks v. Smith, 10 Mees. & W. 355; Heard v. Lodge, 20 Pick. 53, 60, 32 Am. Rep. 197; Cobb v. Hall, 33 Vt. 233, 238; 2 Kent, Com. *505. The plaintiff notified each one of the defendants, by means of the letter of the bank, that he was ready and willing to surrender the stock and the agreement upon the payment of the defendants' obligation, and that the stock was in the bank at their disposal whenever such payment should be made. They did not pay. They suggested no other way for the performance of the agreement. They were silent. They neither performed nor offered to perform their part of the agreement, nor did they object in any way to the time, the place, or the manner of the plaintiff's offer. They knew, from the letter which they received, not only that the plaintiff offered them the stock, but that he had placed it in the bank subject to their disposal upon their payment of the debt they had promised to discharge. In view of the facts that the defendants in this case were bound under the law to pay this debt on or before July 1, 1898, whether the plaintiff completed his performance or not; that there were nine promisors in this covenant to pay; that each one was entitled to the last moment of the business day of July 1, 1898, in which to perform his promise; that each one was entitled to the stock or a part of it when he paid; that their residences and places of business were more than 300 miles apart; that the contract was made, that it was presumably to be performed, and that its subject-matter was located in St. Louis; that the letter of May 16, 1898, informed the defendants that the plaintiff had placed the stock in a convenient business institution in that city subject to their disposal upon the payment of their debt; and that they neither objected to the course he pursued, nor performed nor offered to perform their agreement,—our conclusion is that the plaintiff's offer of performance was fair, reasonable, and sufficient.

The judgment below is accordingly reversed, and the case is remanded to the court below, with instructions to grant a new trial in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

Thayer, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

I am not able to concur in the foregoing opinion, and accordingly express the reasons for my dissent, doing so with as much brevity as possible. The opinion of my associates, as I view it, deals for the most part with principles of the law of contract, which however correctly stated and reinforced by authority are not in my judgment applicable to the case in hand. By the terms of the agreement out of which this controversy arises the plaintiff below agreed to take certain shares of preferred stock in the Central Building Company "in payment for four instalments of rent under his lease, as the same became due. I can perceive no sufficient reason for saying that the delivery of these shares of stock did not operate as payment for the four instalments of rent, and that the plaintiff merely held the stock when delivered in trust and as collateral security for the rent, as the majority of the court seem to hold. This view is not only opposed to the language of the agreement, which recites that the defendants had requested the plaintiff to take the stock "in payment of four instalments of rent," and that he had agreed to do so, but it is not in harmony with the conduct of the plaintiff himself, since it appears that he hypothecated the stock to secure his indebtedness to the Merchants-Laclede National Bank and that it remained hypothecated with that institution for at least two months after the defendants' option to purchase the stock expired; that is to say, for two months subsequent to July 1, 1898. In view of the language of the agreement and the conduct of the parties, I am of opinion that the stock became the absolute property of the plaintiff as soon as it was delivered to him; that it was taken in payment of the rent, and extinguished the same; that the plaintiff had an undoubted right to hypothecate it; and that there is no substantial foundation for the novation theory which is outlined in the opinion of the majority. As I feel constrained to construe the contract, the parties entered into the following stipulations: The plaintiff agreed to accept the preferred stock in payment for certain rent which was to accrue, his motive being, doubtless, to aid in the construction of a valuable building on the leasehold premises, which would insure the payment of many future instalments of rent that were to accrue under his lease, and at the same time greatly enhance the value of his property. On the other hand, the defendants agreed, if the stock was taken in payment of the rent, to purchase it from the plaintiff "on or before the 1st day of July, 1898," for a sum equal to the amount of rent which it had discharged, and the plaintiff agreed to sell the stock at that price. The result was an executory agreement for the sale of the stock, by virtue of which the defendants had the option to buy it at any time before July 1, 1898, when their obligation to take it and pay the purchase price became absolute. The plaintiff on his part had the right to call for performance on July 1, 1898, but not before that time. The contract in question is not essentially different from many contracts for the sale of stock and other securities which are daily made, whereby a vendee acquires the right to exact performance at any time intermediate the making of the agreement and a certain future date, whereas the vendor acquires the right to call for performance only at the latter date. The real question in the case, therefore, as I view it, is not the one stated at the commencement of the majority opinion, and declared to be "the most important question;" but the question is whether the plaintiff's admitted failure to tender the stock on July 1, 1898, and to demand payment therefor, released the defendants from their obligation to perform. This was the question which was decided below in the affirmative, and, as I think, rightly decided. This is not a case, as I view it, where a question arises concerning the right of a person, who has accepted and retained the benefits accruing from a substantial performance of an agreement, to decline to pay for what he has received because of some slight default by the opposite party which may be compensated in damages. When the stock was accepted by the plaintiff, it paid for the instalments of rent, because such was the express agreement of the parties, and presumptively, at least, the stock was adequate payment. After the stock was delivered the plaintiff held the defendant's obligation to buy it on or before July 1, 1898, at a given price; but to maintain an action on this obligation it was his duty to do whatever would be required of any other vendor of stock who agrees to sell and deliver the same on a certain future day, or on any intermediate day if the vendee elects to call for an earlier delivery. In such cases the rule is that on the day when the option expires the vendor must tender the stock and demand payment; time being of the essence. To put the vendee in default there must be an offer of the security sold and a demand for payment, or a waiver of the tender by the vendee. Waterman v. Banks, 144 U. S. 394, 36 L. ed. 479, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 846; Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 29 L. ed. 366, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 12; Kelsey v. Crouther, 162 U. S. 404, 408. 40 L. ed. 1017, 1019, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 808; Kelley v. Upton, 5 Duer, 336; Summer v. Sleeth, 45 Ind. 599; Doloret v. Rothschild, 1 Sim. & Stu. 590; Shinn v. Roberts, 20 N. J. L. 435. 444, 43 Am. Dec. 636; Stillhoell v. Bowling, 36 Mo. 312; Henderson v. Wheaton, 139 Ill. 581, 28 N. E. 1100.

I do not understand that this rule of law is disputed, but the effort seems to be to differentiate the case at bar from those cited, and to show that the rule is inapplicable, on the ground that the contract in suit was not a contract of sale. Now, on the day when the plaintiff had the right to tender the stock in question and exact payment therefor, no such tender or demand was made. The plaintiff did not even have possession of the stock, but the same was then hypothecated to a third party, and remained in its hands for more than two months thereafter. The letter which was written by the pledgee of the stock on May 16, 1898, did not advise the defendants whether the Merchants-Laclede National Bank held the stock as the absolute owner or as pledgee. Neither did it advise the defendants that the bank was acting as agent for the plaintiff, or request the defendants to appoint a suitable place for the delivery of the stock on the day when the plaintiff was entitled to exact payment. The letter was silent on each of these essential points, and for that reason it imposed no liability on the defendants and called for no action on their part. The letter was entirely consistent with the view that the bank had become the absolute owner of the stock; and, if such was the fact, then the defendants were under no obligation to take the stock from it and pay for the same, since an executory agreement like the one in hand is not assignable, and the plaintiff's assignee could not have enforced performance of the agreement to purchase. Roykin v. Campbell, 9 Mo. App. 495; Lansden v. McCarthy, 45 Mo. 106; Lawson, Contr. § 352. The letter of the bank was at most a mere notice that the plaintiff had parted with the stock, and, as it did not state that the bank was acting as agent for the plaintiff, the natural presumption would be that it was acting for itself and of its own volition. In my judgment, therefore, the letter in question did not alter the legal relations of the parties to any extent; and as there was no waiver by the defendants of their right to have the stock tendered to some one of them on the day the obligation to purchase became absolute, and as no request was made by the plaintiff to have them designate a place for delivery, I am of opinion that the trial court properly held that there could be no recovery, and that the judgment below should be affirmed.

CUDAHY PACKING COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

Frank MARCAN, by Next Friend.

(45 C. C. A. 515, 106 Fed. 645.)

- *1. A minor employed as a servant assumes, to the same extent as an adult, the ordinary dangers and risks of his employment which he actually knows and appreciates, and those that are so apparent and open that one of his age, experience, and capacity would, in the exercise of ordinary care, know and appreciate them.
2. At the close of the evidence there is always a preliminary question for the judge before the case can be properly submitted to the jury, and that is whether or not there is any substantial evidence upon which the jury can properly return a verdict in favor of the party who produces it; and, if there is no such evidence, it is the duty of the court to direct the jury to return a verdict against him.
3. A minor who for four weeks has been working upon a block 14 inches square and 5 inches in thickness, placed upon a wet, greasy, and slippery floor by himself, assumes the risk and danger of the slipping of the block upon the greasy floor, by means of which his hand is involuntarily thrown into the cylinders of a chopping machine.

Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Caldwell, Sanborn, and Thayer, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Cowin & Abbott and M. L. Sears, for plaintiff in error:

The plaintiff must be held to the exercise of the same degree of care as an adult, and be charged with the same responsibility, so far as the assumption of risks is concerned.

Messrs. Connell & Ives, for defendant in error:

The trial court could not rightfully direct a verdict against the plaintiff unless it was plain that no recovery could be had upon any view which could properly be taken of the facts the evidence tended to establish.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by an employee against his employer for a failure to discharge its duty to use reasonable diligence to furnish its servant with a reasonably safe place in which to perform his work, and the answer was that the risk and danger from which the servant suffered was one of the ordinary and patent risks of the employment which he had assumed. At the close of the trial the defendant below requested the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict in its favor, and the refusal to grant this request is the chief error of which complaint is made. The Cudahy Packing Company, the plaintiff in error, was a corporation engaged in the business of packing meat, as its name implies, and Frank Marcan was one of its employees, who was engaged in operating a machine for chopping meat, called a "hasher." On April 30, 1898, Marcan accidentally put the fingers of his left hand into the hasher and lost them. He sued the corporation for negligence, in that it permitted the floor, on which he was working to become so slippery that a block on which he was standing slipped, and caused him to throw his hand into the hasher, and in that it used a box or hopper upon the chopping machine to enable the operative to feed the meat into the hasher, which he alleged also contributed to his accident. The great weight of the testimony was that the block did not slip, and that the accident was the result of the carelessness of the defendant in error in feeding the meat into the hasher. Upon the question under consideration, however, this evidence will not be considered, and it is accordingly laid aside. The testimony of the defendant in error and of his witnesses, which alone will be considered in this opinion, was that these were the facts which conditioned his case: He was a minor of ordinary intelligence, more than seventeen years of age. He had been at work for the plaintiff in error for some weeks, when about March 20, 1898, he was assigned to operate the hasher. This hasher consisted of rapidly revolving cylinders, driven by machinery which chopped or hashed the meat which was fed into it through a hole above the cylinders. Over this hole a removable feeding box or hopper was fastened when the machine was in operation. The sides of this feeding box were 5 or 6 inches high, and it was the duty of the defendant in error to feed the meat which was placed in this box into the hasher. When he first took charge of the chopping machine he was taught to draw the meat in the box forward, and to feed it into the hasher through the hole over the cylinders with his hands. But he was afterwards furnished with a wooden tool called a "stuffer," and was instructed by his employer to use this instrument when the machine became clogged for the purpose of stuffing the meat down into and through it. This stuffer was a wooden block $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches in diameter and 4 inches long, provided with a handle. The hasher stood within a few inches of the south wall of the building, on a floor which sloped gently to the north, and when the feeding box was in place it stood so high that it was necessary for the operator to raise himself 4 or 5 inches above the floor in order to do his work conveniently. When the defendant in error commenced to operate this machine he was furnished with a box upon which he stood in front of the hasher to feed the meat into it. But four or five days later this box was broken, and then, by direction of his employer, he took a chopping block, placed it in front of the hasher, and thereafter stood upon this block when he was feeding the machine. This block was made of hard wood, was about 14 inches square, 5 inches thick, and had an iron band around it $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, and $\frac{1}{4}$ inch thick. He placed this block in position the first time he used it, and from time to time thereafter, as it was misplaced during the washing of the floor, he replaced it. Neither the foreman nor any of the other employees of the plaintiff in error handled or placed the block. It was the custom in some packing houses to use salt upon the floor to prevent it from becoming slippery, but no salt was used upon the floor of this building. Marcan testified that the floor upon which this block lay was wet and greasy most of the time, that it was slippery when he first placed the block there, and that he knew it was slippery. He further testified that on April 30, 1898, while he was standing upon the block holding the stuffer in his right hand, and feeding the meat into the hasher with his left hand, the block slipped sideways to his right; that he tried to catch himself, and his hand went down into the machine; and that the block was caused to slip by "the greasy floor not being nailed." This is the case which the defendant in error made when it is conceded that all the testimony which contradicts his story is unfounded in fact.

A servant assumes the ordinary risks and dangers of the employment upon which he enters, so far as they are known to him, and so far as they would have been known to one of his age, experience, and capacity by the use of ordinary care and prudence. A minor assumes the ordinary dangers and risks of his employment that he actually knows and appreciates, and those which are so apparent and open that one of his age, experience, and capacity would, in the exercise of ordinary care and prudence, know and appreciate them to the same extent as an adult. By entering upon and continuing in the employment he assumes these risks and dangers, and no negligence can be charged to the master, and no liability can be fastened upon him, because he fails to give notices or warnings of or to remove these common risks of the employment. Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Erickson, 5 C. C. A. 341, 344, 12 U. S. App. 260, 265, 55 Fed. 943, 946; Chicago Anderson Pressed Brick Co. v. Reinneiger, 140 Ill. 334, 29 N. E. 1106, 1107; Douling v. Allen, 74 Mo. 13, 16, 41 Am. Rep. 298; St. Louis & S. E. R. Co. v. Valirius, 56 Ind. 511, 518; Buckley v. Gutta Percha & Rubber Mfg. Co. 113 N. Y. 540, 21 N. E. 717; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Frauley, 110 Ind. 18, 9 N. E. 595, 598; Atlas Engine Works v. Randall, 100 Ind. 293, 298, 300, 50 Am. Rep. 798; Berger v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 39 Minn. 78, 38 N. W. 814; Sullivan v. India Mfg. Co. 113 Mass. 396; Fones v. Phillips, 39 Ark. 17, 38, 43 Am. Rep. 264. Under this well-settled rule and the testimony of the defendant in error, it is impossible to sustain his recovery in this case. He testified that his accident was caused by the slipping of the block which he himself placed before the hasher on the wet and greasy floor. He knew that the floor was wet, greasy, and slippery. He had walked and worked upon the floor, placed and replaced the block upon it, for four weeks. If it was wet, greasy, and slippery, he knew the fact; knew his liability to slip and fall as he walked across it; knew the danger that the block itself might slip. If, as he walked along the floor, he had slipped and fallen, could he have recovered of the plaintiff in error? The question is susceptible of but one true answer. But he was as familiar with the danger that the block would slip as he was with the risk of the slipping of his feet. He, and he alone had handled, placed, and replaced the block during the four weeks that he had occupied it as his standing ground. He knew that, if his fingers fell into the hasher, they would be injured, perhaps destroyed. All these risks and dangers were so simple, open, obvious, that the conclusion is inevitable that he impliedly contracted, not only to work in this place, but also to assume the danger of accidents arising from the wet, greasy, and slippery floor, and the revolving cylinders of the chopping machine. Kleinest v. Kunhardt, 100 Mass. 230, 35 N. E. 458; O'Malley v. South Boston Gaslight Co. 158 Mass. 135, 47 L. R. A. 161, 32 N. E. 1119; Fisk v. Fitchburg R. Co. 158 Mass. 238, 33

There was therefore no substantial evidence in this case upon which the jury could properly render a verdict in favor of the defendant in error, and it was the duty of the court below to direct them to return a verdict against him. *Chicago G. There are other specifications of error in this case, but it is unnecessary to consider them.

The judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded to the court below, with instructions to grant a new trial.

Rehearing denied.

LOS ANGELES UNIVERSITY et al.,
Appts.,

v.

(46 C. C. A. 647, 107 Fed. 798.)

1. A covenant, and not a condition, is created by a clause in a conveyance of land for a college campus, which states that the conveyance is upon express condition that the land shall be devoted exclusively as part of the campus, although another condition is that it shall revert to the grantor if abandoned or devoted to other uses before a certain date, after which a forfeiture is not to occur under any circumstances.
2. Persons who have conveyed property for a college campus upon condition that it shall be used for no other purpose have, after they have disposed of all land in the vicinity which can be benefited by performance of the covenant, no standing in a court of equity to enforce such performance.
3. A covenant in a conveyance of land for a college campus, that it shall be devoted exclusively as a part of the campus, and that no buildings shall be erected thereon except those devoted to university purposes, is not broken by the placing thereon of lumber, tools, sheds, derricks, engines, and oil tanks for the exploration for oil supposed to be beneath the surface, where such occupation will probably be of a temporary character, even if oil is found, and the general purposes of the grant may be materially advanced by the pecuniary results of the development.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of California granting a preliminary injunction to restrain them from converting land conveyed to the university in trust to the purpose of prospecting for oil. Reversed.

Statement by Morrow, Circuit Judge:

This is an appeal from an order granting a preliminary injunction. The suit was brought by the appellees to restrain the appellants from converting and using part of the campus of the Los Angeles University for the purpose of excavating, drilling, and digging into the land for oil, and from erecting, on and over the surface of the land, buildings and derricks, and from converting the campus into an oil field and a place for conducting an oil business, to the injury and damage of the land as a campus for a university or an institution of learning and education. The bill alleges, among other things, that in the year 1886 the complainants and John S. Maltman and G. R. Shatto were the owners of large tracts of land adjoining the city of Los Angeles, situated on the city's western boundary, which said land has since become part of the municipality of Los Angeles by annexation; that during the year 1886 a number of persons, representing and being members of the religious organization known as the "Baptist Denomination in Southern California," devised and projected a plan for the establishment and maintenance of a university for educational purposes, to be located in or near the city of Los Angeles, state of California, to be under the control of the Baptist Denomination; that members, representatives, and agents of the said Baptist Denomination represented to complainants that they were authorized by said denomination to search out the most suitable location that could be secured for a campus, and land that could be obtained by donation to aid in the establishment of said university; that the agents and representatives of said denomination requested and urged complainants to donate their interests in the land described in the bill of complaint for part of a campus for said university, and to this end they set forth the many benefits that would accrue to the owners of lands in the vicinity of such an institution, (in) drives, walks, trees, shrubs, and flowers, and college buildings, residences for professors, and the many sales of lots and lands that would be made to those preferring homes amid refinement and culture, where their children could have the advantages of a Christian education; that in furtherance of said plans, and to assist the establishment of said university, many subscriptions of money and lands were thus solicited and secured from owners of land in the vicinity of said campus; that to this purpose complainants and J. S. Maltman and G. R. Shatto agreed to subscribe, and did subscribe, as a gift for a campus, 15 acres of land, to be used exclusively as a campus for said proposed university; that the agents, representatives, and members of the said Baptist Denomination and others associated themselves in the establishment of said university, and organized for that purpose, under the laws of the state of California, a corporation known as the "Los Angeles University." Complainants allege that they joined in said subscription, and promised to give the interest owned by them in said land for a campus, relying upon the representations made, and believing that the same would be carried out, and that a university that would be a seat of learning under the control and patronage of the organization known as the "Baptist Denomination" would be erected on said land, and that the same would be used exclusively and only as a campus for said university, and for no other purpose, and for all time; that thereafter, on September 16, 1886, in compliance with the promise made and set forth in said subscription, complainants and John S. Maltman made a deed of grant conveying to said Los Angeles University the land described in the bill, comprising 7½ acres, being the south half of said campus; that there was no money consideration given or received for said deed, and no consideration whatever from the grantee for the land other than the promise to establish and maintain a university, and to use the said land exclusively as a campus therefor, and for all time; that one of the conditions of the conveyance, and a covenant set forth in said bill, was the following: "First, that the said land shall be used exclusively as a part of the campus of said university, and no buildings shall be erected thereon except those devoted to university purposes." It is further alleged that, after the execution of said deed, the defendant the Los Angeles University erected, or caused to be erected, one building on the said campus, and the said building has been used almost continuously for educational purposes and as a dormitory for teachers and pupils, but that there never was established a university, as promised, and according to the terms and conditions of the articles of incorporation of said defendant the Los Angeles University; and there has never been conducted and maintained upon said premises by said defendant, its agents or lessees, more than an academic school for the education of children and students in academic grades and classes, and part of the time only primary schools have been conducted; and for about four years last past a nonsectarian boarding and military school for boys has been conducted by lessees of the said building and campus. It is also alleged that at all times since the conveyance of said land to the grantee, until on or about the 9th day of April, 1900, the whole of said land was used as a campus for such educational institution as was being conducted in the building erected thereupon; that on or about the 9th day of April, 1900, the defendants the College Oil Company and Richard Green, with the consent of, and by reason of and under some agreement, lease, or understanding with, the defendant the Los Angeles University, entered upon the south half of said campus, and that part thereof conveyed to defendants by the complainants and J. S. Maltman, with wagons, lumber, tools, and machinery, built a tool house, erected derricks, set up an engine and boiler and oil tanks, and on the 18th day of April, 1900, began, and at the time of filing the bill were, excavating, drilling, and digging the soil of and into said lands, seeking for petroleum there, to the great and irreparable injury of the land for a university campus or a campus for an educational institution; that the defendants intend to and have contracted and arranged for the drilling and digging of a large number of oil wells, the erection of a pumping plant and many derricks, oil tanks, pipes, tubing, and other apparatus used in the business of producing and selling crude oil, upon said campus, and will convert said campus into an oil field and a place for conducting an oil business, to the great and irreparable injury and damage of said lands as a campus for a university or an institution of learning and education; that the operations of the defendants interrupt the use and enjoyment of said lands for a campus, and that the complainants have never consented, and do not consent, to such use of said lands by defendants. Upon this bill of complaint, duly verified, the complainants moved for an injunction. An order to show cause was issued, and the defendants appeared and filed affidavits in opposition. It appears from these affidavits that the Los Angeles University was incorporated on the 22d day of June, 1886, for the purpose, as declared in the articles of incorporation, of securing and holding by purchase, gift, devise, bequest, or grant, real and personal property, and of selling, mortgaging, leasing, or otherwise disposing of the same, and of erecting buildings and establishing and maintaining a university for educational purposes. It is admitted that the defendants have commenced the operations described in the bill of complaint, but it is averred, among other things, that in the maintenance of the university a debt of about $16,000 has been incurred and is unpaid; that to secure the payment of such indebtedness the trustees of the university mortgaged all of its property, including the lands described in the bill of complaint; that within two years last past extensive explorations immediately adjacent to and on all sides of said lands has made it plain that the said land is underlaid by a valuable and extensive deposit of oil-bearing sand; that the proposed and begun extraction of oil from said land will not and would not irreparably or at all permanently injure said land for use as a college campus, but that it will enable the defendant the better to carry out the purposes of the donor; that observation of the course of oil operations in the vicinity shows that such operations are not likely to continue on the same ground for a long period; that by the extraction of the oil from the oil sands under the land in question it is proposed, and it will be possible, to pay off this indebtedness, and to release all of the property from the mortgage lien, and to procure valuable additional assets for the maintenance of an educational institution upon the premises; that drilling shows that the oil stratum in that region dips slightly to the southward; that experience proves that in oil-bearing strata the crude oil tends to drain towards pumping wells, and especially so if the strata dip in that direction, as in this case, and it is very probable that wells to the southward of the lands in question are continually draining away valuable portions of the oil contained in the strata under the lands described in the bill of complaint; that on the west and northwest, and adjacent to said land, wells have been bored, and are being continuously pumped, and that wells are being bored at a distance of about 80 feet eastward from the east line of said lands. It is alleged, upon information and belief, that complainants have no lands or property lying near to or anywhere so situated with reference to the lands described in the bill that they could in any wise be affected by any particular use of said land. A copy of the deed of conveyance mentioned in the bill of complaint is attached to one of the affidavits. From this deed it appears that the grant was made in consideration of the sum of $1, lawful money of the United States of America, paid by the party of the second part to the parties of the first part, the receipt whereof was thereby acknowledged, and that they granted, bargained, sold, and conveyed the real property in controversy to the party of the second part. The habendum clause of the deed is as follows: "To have and to hold, all and singular, the said premises, together with the appurtenances, unto the said party of the second part, and to its legal successors, forever." The deed recites that: "This conveyance is made upon the express conditions and for the consideration hereinafter named, to wit: First. That said land shall be devoted exclusively as a part of the campus of said university, and no buildings shall be erected thereon except those devoted to university purposes. Second. That at least one building, costing not less than ten thousand dollars, shall be erected on said campus and completed on or before September 1st, 1897. Third. That in case of abandonment of said premises for such university at any time before January 1st, 1894, or in case of the nonuser thereof, or in case said premises, or any part thereof, is devoted to purposes other than as above specified, then said premises shall immediately revert to the grantors herein, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns; the intention being that the reversion herein mentioned shall not occur after January 1st, 1894, under any circumstances." Upon the hearing the court entered an interlocutory order granting the preliminary injunction prayed for in the bill of complaint. From this order the defendants prosecute the present appeal.

Argued before Gilbert and Morrow, Circuit Judges, and Hawley, District Judge.

Messrs. Bicknell, Gibson, & Trask, and T. M. Stewart, for appellants:

Appellees have no cause of action for injunction, as they own no land to be affected by any possible use that may be made of the land in question.

The restrictions were inserted for the benefit "that would accrue to the owners of lands in the vicinity." But the complainants do not show that they are the owners of any of the said lands, and it is affirmatively alleged that they are not.

Conditions or covenants restricting the use of lands are inserted for the benefit of grantors and their heirs, or for the benefit of holders of adjacent lands.

If the former, right to enforce the restriction is limited to the time of continuance of ownership of some part of the lands out of which the granted land has been carved, or to which the scheme of improvement correlates it.

The deed itself removed all restrictions January 1, 1894.

If any covenant is contained in this deed, it is only by implication, and such would not, in accurate speech, be a subject for construction.

Covenants are to be construed as nearly as possible by the obvious intentions of the parties, which must be gathered from the whole context of the instrument, interpreted according to the reasonable sense of the words.

Mr. John W. Mitchell for appellees.

Morrow, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended by the appellants: First. That by the third conditional clause of the deed of September 16, 1896, the title of the grantees to the land in question became absolute and free from all limitations and restrictions on January 1, 1894, when the period for reversion therein provided had expired. Second. Assuming that the restriction contained in the first conditional clause of the deed continued as a limitation upon the use of the land, it is contended on the part of the appellants that the complainants cannot enforce the restriction in the absence of a showing that they are the owners or have an interest in land for the benefit of which the restriction was intended by the grantors and provided for in the deed.

The deed recites that the conveyance is made upon the "express conditions" and for the considerations thereafter named. Then follow the three clauses of the deed containing these "express conditions." These clauses provide: (1) That the land conveyed shall be devoted exclusively as a part of the campus of the university, and that no buildings shall be erected thereon except those devoted to university purposes; (2) that at least one building, costing not less than $10,000, shall be erected on said campus on or before September 1, 1897; (3) that the premises described in the deed shall revert to the grantors if abandoned or devoted to purposes other than those specified at any time before January 1, 1894, but under no circumstances is a forfeiture to occur after that date. If these three clauses be construed as conditions, as they are declared to be in the deed, and as their technical terms would seem to indicate, it follows as a legal consequence that the title to the land became absolute in the grantee and free from all limitations and restrictions on January 1, 1894. The consequence of the nonfulfilment of a condition is the forfeiture of the estate. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 3; Woodruff v. Woodruff, 44 N. J. Eq. 349, 353, 1 L. R. A. 380, 16 Atl. 4; Adams v. Valentine, 33 Fed. 1; Woodruff v. Trenton Water Power Co. 10 N. J. Eq. 489, 508; Episcopal City Mission v. Appleton, 117 Mass. 326, 329; Langley v. Chapin, 134 Mass. 82. When, therefore, by the terms of the conveyance, the period of forfeiture has passed, the condition has been discharged, and the estate is no longer subject to its limitation or restriction. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. 96. But may it not have been the intention of the grantors in this conveyance to create a condition in the third clause, where a forfeiture is specifically declared, and a covenant running with the land in the first clause? Conditions are not favored in law, and are construed strictly, because they tend to destroy estates. 4 Kent, Com. 130; Crane v. Hyde Park, 135 Mass. 147; McKelvey v. Seymour, 29 N. J. L. 321, 327; Watterson v. Ury, 5 Ohio C. C. 347; Re Wellington, 16 Pick. 87, 90, 26 Am. Dec. 631. And if it be doubtful whether a clause in a deed be a covenant or a condition, the court will incline against the latter construction. 4 Kent, Com. 132; Greene v. O'Connor, 18 R. I. 56, 19 L. R. A. 202, 25 Atl. 692; Adams v. Valentine, 33 Fed. 1.

In Post v. Weil, 115 N. Y. 361, 366, 5 L. R. A. 422, 22 N. E. 145, the court of appeals of New York, in considering whether a clause of a deed should be construed as a condition or a covenant, said: "Mere words should not be, and have not usually been, deemed sufficient to constitute a condition, and to entail the consequences of forfeiture of an estate, unless from the proof such appears to have been the distinct intention of the grantor and a necessary understanding of the parties to the instrument. Nor should the formal arrangement of the words influence us wholly in determining what the clause was inserted to accomplish; but in this, as in every other case, our judgment should be guided by what was the probable intention, viewing the matter in the light of reason."

Applying this rule to the first clause of the deed under consideration, we find sufficient reason in the evident purpose of the conveyance and in the situation of the parties, as disclosed by the surrounding circumstances, to construe this clause separately, not as a condition, but as a covenant. What, then, is the remedy for the nonfulfillment of a covenant? The delinquent party must respond in damages; but a court of equity can in a proper case enforce the specific performance of a covenant of this character. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1342; Woodruff v. Woodruff, 44 N. J. Eq. 349, 1 L. R. A. 380, 16 Atl. 4.

This brings us to the consideration of the question whether, in proceedings by injunction to enforce the specific performance of a covenant, it is necessary for the complainant to show that he is beneficially interested in the performance of the covenant. The general rule is that the complainant is not entitled to an injunction in any case unless it is shown that he has some vested right or interest that will suffer irreparable injury from the act which he seeks to restrain. Branch Turnp. Co. v. Yuba County Supers. 13 Cal. 190; Bank of California v. Fresno Canal & Irrig. Co. 53 Cal. 201, 203; New York v. Mapes, 6 Johns. Ch. 46; High, Inj. 3d ed. § 9. But there is a distinction to be observed, in enforcing covenants, between a case where the complainant seeks to prevent or abate a nuisance, and a case where the complainant has an interest or title to real estate, in favor of which there is a covenant securing a privilege or right binding in equity. In the latter case it is said that the covenantee has the right to have the actual enjoyment of his property modo et forma, in accordance with the stipulation in that behalf, and that it is no answer to say that the act complained of will inflict no injury upon him. 2 High, Inj. § 1153; 1 Beach, Inj. § 480; Kirkpatrick v. Peshine, 24 N. J. Eq. 216. But in such case it is clear that the complainant must show that he has some interest or title in the land to be protected. This right or interest is the very foundation of his action. He must show that he is the owner of or has an interest in the premises in favor of which the benefit or privilege has been created; otherwise, he has no interest in the covenant and is a mere intruder.

In Parker v. Nightingale, 6 Allen, 341, 83 Am. Dec. 632, the suit was brought by the plaintiff in behalf of himself and eleven others, each the owner of a dwelling house and lot on a certain street in Boston, to restrain the defendant Nightingale, another house and lot owner on the same street, from converting his dwelling house into a restaurant. The bill set forth that, before the erection of the said dwelling houses, the land upon and adjoining the street designated belonged to one Hayward; that upon his decease his heirs agreed among themselves that the land should be divided into house lots, and, when conveyed, the grantees should take subject to the condition that no buildings should be erected thereon except for dwelling houses. A lot was conveyed to the defendant upon such condition. Defendant leased the premises to another, who had taken steps to convert the dwelling house into a restaurant. Plaintiffs sought an injunction against such use of the premises. The court, through Bigelow, Ch. J., said: "A court of chancery will recognize and enforce agreements concerning the occupation and mode of use of real estate, although they are not expressed with technical accuracy, as exceptions or reservations out of a grant not binding as covenants real running with the land. Nor is it at all material that such stipulations should be binding at law, or that any privity of estate should subsist between parties, in order to render them obligatory, and to warrant equitable relief in case of their infraction. A covenant, though in gross at law, may nevertheless be binding in equity, even to the extent of fastening a servitude or easement on real property, or of securing to the owner of one parcel of land a privilege, or, as it is sometimes called, 'a right to an amenity,' in the use of an adjoining parcel by which his own estate may be enhanced in value or rendered more agreeable as a place of residence." After a further statement of the principles involved, it was held that the plaintiffs were entitled to equitable relief in the enforcement of the restriction contained in the conveyance to the defendant, as owners of the estates for whose benefit the restriction was originally designed; that the purpose of the restriction was to secure to each estate the benefit or advantage which would arise from the specific mode in which the adjoining premises were to be improved and occupied, giving a right or privilege of amenity in each lot within the restriction to the owners of all the other lots within the designated limits. The question arose in this case whether the original grantors were not necessary parties to the proceedings. Upon this question the court said: "In strictness, perhaps, the right or interest created by the restrictions, being a qualification of the fee, did not pass out of the original grantors, and now remains vested in them or their heirs. But, if so, they hold it only as a dry trust, in which they have no beneficial use or enjoyment, the entire usufruct being in their grantees and their assigns now holding the estates, for whose use and benefit it was intended. Such being the case, then the latter are proper parties to enforce the restriction, and the former, not having any present interest in it, need not be parties to the proceeding."

This is the precise question in the present case, and determines that the complainant, having no present interest in the enforcement of the covenant under consideration, has no right of action against the defendants.

In Sandborn v. Rice, 129 Mass. 387, 396, there was a bill to enforce certain restrictions contained in conveyances by a common grantor. Concerning such a restriction the court said: "It often happens that owners of land, which they design to put into market in lots for dwelling houses, insert in the deeds of the several lots a uniform set of restrictions as to the purposes for which the land may be used, and as to the portions of it which may be covered by buildings. So far as these restrictions are reasonable in their character, they are upheld and enforced by courts of equity in favor of the original owner, so long as he continues to own any part of the tract for the benefit of which the restrictions were created, as well as in favor of the owner of any one of the lots into which the tract was divided, and against the owner of any of the lots who attempts to set the restrictions at naught."

In Clark v. Martin, 49 Pa. 289, each grantee of adjoining lots had covenanted not to build on the rear portion of his premises above a certain height. The complainant had become the purchaser of a lot adjoining that which the defendant had bought, subject to the condition, and it was held that he was entitled to an injunction against a violation of the covenant on the ground that the condition was imposed for the benefit of such adjoining lot. The court declared it to be plain "that the duty created by the condition and restriction is a duty to the owner of the adjoining lot, whoever he might be." In Watrous v. Allen, 57 Mich. 362, 58 Am. Rep. 363, 24 N. W. 104, the grantor conveyed premises with the condition that, if spirituous or intoxicating liquors should be sold or kept for sale on the granted premises, the title to the premises should revert to and vest in the grantor, his heirs and assigns. The condition was treated as a covenant, and enforced by injunction in favor of the assignee of the grantor, on the ground that the restriction was inserted in the deed for the benefit of the grantor as the owner of the land and of lots in the vicinity contiguous to the granted premises, and that whatever rights, interests, and benefits the grantor had by virtue of the restriction belonged to the complainant. In Whitney v. Union R. Co. 11 Gray, 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715, it was held that plaintiff's right to equitable relief in the enforcement of a restriction as to the use of certain premises was because she was the owner and occupier of a part of the estate for the benefit and advantage of which the restriction was imposed, and therefore had a present right and interest in its enforcement. In Graves v. Deterling, 120 N. Y. 447, 24 N. E. 655, the plaintiffs sought to recover possession of certain property upon the ground that the abandonment of its use as a park worked a forfeiture, and that they, as heirs of the grantor, were entitled to the reversionary title. The court construed the restriction in the deed of conveyance as securing a benefit of the grantors and their heirs by way of forfeiture or reversion, and that as the whole title to the park and the contiguous lots passed from plaintiff's ancestor in his lifetime, they inherited no right to either, and, having title to neither the park nor to any land for the benefit of which the park was created, they had no foundation upon which to base an action.

In these and other cases that might be cited, where the complainant has maintained his right to the remedy by injunction, he has shown that he had some interest or estate to protect for the benefit of which the covenant had been created. In the last case cited, the complainants failing to show such an interest, the complaint was dismissed upon the ground that the complainants had no right or interest upon which an action could be founded. And in reason and principle this must be the rule upon the subject. In general terms, the benefit of a condition in a grant is reserved to the grantor and his heirs without regard to the ownership of other property; but, where the grant contains a restriction in the nature of a covenant that has relation to a benefit to adjoining property, the restriction can only be enforced in favor of the title to such adjoining property.

In the case at bar it is alleged in the bill that complainants and others were the owners of large tracts of land adjoining the city of Los Angeles, including the land in question; that representatives of the proposed university urged upon the complainants the donation of a tract of land for part of the campus of the university, setting forth the many benefits that would accrue to the owners of land in the vicinity of such an institution, in drives, walks, trees, shrubs, and flowers, college buildings, residences for professors, and in the many sales of lots of land that would be made to those preferring homes amid refinement and culture, where their children could have the advantages of a Christian education; and in furtherance of such plans, and to assist in the establishment of said university, many subscriptions of money and land were thus solicited and received from the owners of land in the vicinity of said campus, and to this purpose complainants and others, relying upon these representations, agreed to subscribe and did subscribe, as a gift, the land in question, to be used exclusively as a campus for said proposed university. But the complainants do not show in their bill, and it is not shown by affidavit or otherwise, that they are now the owners of or have any interest in any lands in the vicinity of the university buildings or the campus connected therewith, but, on the contrary, it is averred upon information and belief, in one of the affidavits, that the complainants have no such interest. The inference is, therefore, that the complainants are not in any way interested in the benefit arising from the restriction or limitation placed upon the granted estate by the terms of the covenant contained in the deed, and that the complainants will not be damaged by the failure of the defendants to comply with the terms of the covenant. They are therefore not in a position to maintain this action. We are of the further opinion that it does not appear that the proposed explorations for oil on the land in question will be a substantial violation of the restriction contained in the covenant under consideration. The educational institution now upon the premises is to be continued, and the proposed operations upon the tract of land now in use as a campus will probably be of a temporary character. The general purpose of the original grant will not be defeated, but may be materially advanced in the pecuniary results to be derived from the development of the wealth supposed to be under the surface of the land.

The interlocutory decree will therefore be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

Knox GIBSON, Appt.,

v.

(.....Ark.....)

1. Under statutory authority to prevent the running at large of dogs, a municipal corporation may exact a fee of $1.50 for the privilege of keeping a dog, and in case of its nonpayment impose a fine upon the owner and provide for the killing of the dog.
2. A statement in an agreed statement of facts in a proceeding for violation of an ordinance regulating the keeping of dogs, that the sum exacted for the privilege of keeping them is intended as a tax for revenue, is not binding on the courts where the ordinance shows that it is a license fee.

(June 15, 1901.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Boone County affirming a conviction by the mayor of the town of Harrison for failure to comply with an ordinance fixing a tax on dogs. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. W. Story and B. B. Hudgins, for appellant:

The ordinance under which appellant is prosecuted violates § 11, art. 16, of the Constitution of this state in that it does not distinctly state the object for which it seeks to impose the tax.

The citizen must be distinctly advised by the ordinance or the law, as to the purpose for which he is required to pay the tax.

Vance v. Little Rock, 30 Ark. 435.

The appellee had no inherent power to levy taxes, and could only levy such as the legislature has plainly authorized it to levy.

The dog is property, and now has such intrinsic and market value as renders him easily the subject of ad valorem taxation, as other personal property is taxed; and the ordinance violates art. 16, § 5 of the Constitution.

If this court could disregard the agreed facts as to the intent and purpose of the ordinance, and should find that the ordinance was a valid police regulation, and not a measure to raise revenue, then we contend it would still be void because it is shown that the amount charged is greatly in excess of what is necessary.

On the 1st day of August, 1900, Knox Gibson was arrested, under a warrant issued by the mayor of the incorporated town of Harrison, for failing to pay a tax on a dog owned by him for the year 1900, after lawful demand for the tax. He was carried before the mayor, tried, convicted, fined $5, and ordered to jail, or to be worked on the streets of Harrison until discharged in due course of law, in default of the payment of the fine and costs. He appealed to the Boone circuit court, where he was tried by the court sitting as a jury, convicted, and fined in the sum of $5. He has appealed to this court.

His offense consisted in a violation of the ordinances of the incorporated town of Harrison in respect to dogs.

On the 10th day of May, 1899, an ordinance of the town was published, which is as follows:

"An Ordinance to Tax Dogs in the Incorporated Town of Harrison, Arkansas.

"There shall be collected on every dog owned and kept in the town of Harrison, over the age of six months, a tax of $1.50 per annum; the year therefor ending December 31st.

"Every person owning or keeping such dog shall apply to the recorder of said town, and on payment of the sum of $1.50 shall receive a receipt for said sum, and shall be furnished with a collar and a tag showing that said sum has been paid.

"Every person keeping a dog or dogs subject to this tax in said town of Harrison, without paying such tax, shall be subject to a fine of not less than $5: provided, that no person shall incur this penalty until five days after they have been notified by the town marshal of their liability to pay said tax, and a failure thereafter to pay the same."

This ordinance was amended by ordinance published June 14, 1899, as follows:

"That where dogs are found about premises in said incorporation on which no tax has been paid as required by said ordinance, that it shall be the duty of the marshal of said incorporated town of Harrison to verbally notify the person in charge of the premises to come forward within three days and pay said tax, and unless said person charged of said premises shall disclaim any ownership in said dog by himself or any member of his family when so notified, or shall fail for three days after said notification to pay tax on said dog, he shall be guilty of a violation of this ordinance, and punishable as provided by said original ordinance.

"Be it further ordained that, if the owner of said premises or person in charge thereof shall disclaim any interest in said dog or claim thereto by himself or any member of his family when notified by said marshal, then it shall be the duty of the marshal to employ some competent person who will take charge of said dog and keep him in some convenient place in the town of Harrison for the period of twenty-four hours, and if during that time no person will pay the tax on said dog, then it shall be the duty of the person so employed to kill said dog, and remove his carcass beyond the limits of said town.

"Be it further ordained, that it shall be the duty of the said marshal to contract with said person on the best and most reasonable terms that he can with reference to said impounding and killing said dogs at not exceeding 50 cents per head."

The ordinance was further amended in June, 1900, as follows:

"Sec. 1. It shall be the duty of the recorder of said town to procure the proper number of tags and collars for the dogs subject to taxation in said town, and that he shall furnish the same to all who apply on or before the 1st day of July, 1900, for such tag and collar, at and for the sum of $1, for each dog subject to tax in said town. After the said 1st day of July all persons shall be liable to pay the full amount of tax required by the original ordinance, to wit, $1.50 for each dog subject to tax: provided, that where a dog is brought into town or becomes of the age for which tax is required after the said 1st day of July, 1900, he shall have fifteen days after said dog becomes subject to taxation in which to pay the said $1.00, and failing to pay in said time he shall be required to pay said sum of $1.50.

"Sec. 2. That the marshal shall, by and with the consent of the mayor, appoint some suitable person to collect the tax from those who fail to procure from the recorder the tag and collar aforesaid, or to take charge of and kill or otherwise dispose of said dog, for which he shall be allowed the sum of 50 cents for each tax so collected or each dog so killed or disposed of according to said ordinance."

The only evidence adduced in the trial of this cause in the circuit court was the foregoing ordinances and an agreed statement of facts as follows:

"Town of Harrison v. Knox Gibson. It is hereby agreed between the attorneys for the plaintiff and the attorneys for the defendant that at and before the issuance of the warrant of arrest in this case by the mayor of the incorporated town that the said Knox Gibson owned and kept in the limits of the town of Harrison a dog over six months of age; that he had failed to pay the tax provided for in the ordinance of said town; that he failed to pay the same on or before the 1st day of July, 1900; that he had been verbally notified for more than three days to come forward and pay the tax on said dog, which he had failed and refused to do.

"It is further agreed that the ordinance is intended to tax for revenue, and not to regulate the running at large of dogs; that the expense of procuring the collar and the tag thereon would not exceed the sum of 20 cents."

There is a discrepancy between the ordinances and the agreed statement of facts. In 54 L. R. A.

the agreed statement of facts it is stated that the ordinances were intended to tax for revenue, and not to regulate the running at large of dogs, and the ordinances show that they were intended to regulate, and that the $1.50 or $1 was imposed as a fee for the privilege of keeping a dog. This fee was not to be collected as a tax. If the owner failed to pay it after demand, he was subject to a fine of not less than $5. Upon payment of the fee he was furnished with a receipt for the same, and a collar and tag, which was, manifestly, intended to be worn by the dog. It is made the duty of the marshal of the town, upon finding a dog upon any premises within the corporate limits, for the keeping of which no fee has been paid, to notify the person in charge of the premises to pay the tax; and such person, unless he, for himself and every member of his family, disclaims ownership of the dog, or pays the fee for keeping him, is punishable as provided by the ordinances. All dogs for which the fees are not paid, upon certain proceedings had, are required by the ordinances to be killed. All these requirements and regulations show the object of the ordinance to relieve the town of the worthless dogs, and to limit the right to keep dogs to those which the owners find sufficiently useful to justify them in paying the fee.

These ordinances, so far as it is necessary for us to consider them, are valid as police regulations. Section 5138 of Sandels & Hill's Digest authorizes the councils of all municipal corporations in this state "to prevent the running at large of dogs, and injuries and annoyances therefrom, and to authorize the destruction of the same, when at large, contrary to any prohibition to that effect." Under the power to prevent injuries and annoyances therefrom (the dogs), the town council of the incorporated town of Harrison had the authority to enact the ordinances in question.

Ordinances and statutes of the general character of those in question have been enacted in other states, and have been generally, if not universally, upheld by the courts. In the state of Kentucky the charter of the city of Frankfort delegated to its council authority to make by-laws for the comfort and security of its citizens. A penal ordinance for security against pestilent dogs not seeming, on trial, sufficient for the end, the council adopted the following supplemental provision: "That all persons owning or controlling dogs within the city of Frankfort are hereby required annually on the 10th day of April to apply to the city clerk to register, and procure a brass collar, duly stamped, for each dog, and pay to the clerk at the time of registry a tax of $2 for every dog so owned and registered; which tax the clerk shall pay into the city treasury. Any person failing to comply with the provision of this ordinance shall, on conviction before the police judge, be fined the sum of $5 for each day of failure and for each dog owned or controlled by him not registered as aforesaid. The marshal or any police officer shall forthwith kill any dog found upon the streets without such collar as procured from the city clerk."

In Com. v. Markham, 7 Bush, 486, the court of appeals, in speaking of the "tax of $2 for every dog," said: "But, though called a tax, yet it is, in our opinion, not a revenue levy in either purpose or operation. It was obviously intended as a police regulation for reducing the number of mischievous dogs, getting clear of the worthless, and securing the owners of the most valuable and harmless against unauthorized and wanton destruction; and, thus interpreted, the ordinance is a license law, $2 the price of the license or 'tax' for the privilege, and the collar and stamp are passports for the security of registered dogs. Presuming that the owners of worthless or pestilent dogs would not pay such a tax for such a license, the expulsion or destruction of inferior or dangerous dogs, as well as protection to the useful class, was the constructive aim of this enactment by the council." Mitchell v. Williams, 27 Ind. 62; Ex parte Cooper, 3 Tex. App. 482, 30 Am. Rep. 152.

In Sentell v. New Orleans & O. R. Co. 166 U. S. 698, 41 L. ed. 1169, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693, "a statute providing that no dog shall be entitled to the protection of the law unless placed upon the assessment rolls, and that in a civil action for killing a dog the owner cannot recover beyond the value fixed by himself in the last assessment preceding the killing," was held to be within the power of the state. Mr. Justice Brown, in speaking for the court, said: "They [dogs] have no intrinsic value,—by which we understand a value common to all dogs as such, and independent of the particular breed or individual. Unlike other domestic animals, they are useful neither as beasts of burden, for draught (except to a limited extent), nor for food. They are peculiar in the fact that they differ among themselves more widely than any other class of animals, and can hardly be said to have a characteristic common to the entire race. While the higher breeds rank among the noblest representatives of the animal kingdom, and are justly esteemed for their intelligence, sagacity, fidelity, watchfulness, affection, and, above all, for their natural companionship with man, others are afflicted with such serious infirmities of temper as to be little better than a public nuisance. All are more or less subject to attacks of hydrophobic madness. As it is practically impossible by statute to distinguish between the different breeds, or between the valuable and the worthless, such legislation as has been enacted upon the subject, though nominally including the whole canine race, is really directed against the latter class, and is based upon the theory that the owner of a really valuable dog will feel sufficient interest in him to comply with any reasonable regulation designed to distinguish him from the common herd. Acting upon the principle that there is but a qualified property in them, and that, while private interests require that the valuable ones shall be protected, public interests demand that the worthless shall be exterminated, they have, from time immemorial, been considered as holding their lives at the will of the legislature, and properly falling within the police power of the several states. Laws for the protection of domestic animals are regarded as having but a limited application to dogs and cats, and, regardless of statute, a ferocious dog is looked upon as hostis humani generis, and as having no right to his life which man is bound to respect." Again, he says: "Although dogs are ordinarily harmless, they preserve some of their hereditary wolfish instincts, which occasionally break forth in the destruction of sheep and other helpless animals. Others, too small to attack these animals, are simply vicious, noisy, and pestilent. As their depredations are often committed at night, it is usually impossible to identify the dog, or to fix the liability upon the owner, who, moreover, is likely to be pecuniarily irresponsible. In short, the damages are usually such as are beyond the reach of judicial process, and legislation of a drastic nature is necessary to protect persons and property from destruction and annoyance. Such legislation is clearly within the police power of the state. It ordinarily takes the form of a license tax, and the identification of the dog by a collar and tag, upon which the name of the owner is sometimes required to be engraved; but other remedies are not uncommon."

We have quoted at length from opinions in cases to show that the ordinances in question are valid police regulations, and the reason why they should be treated as such. But appellant says that in the agreed statement of facts, upon which the issues in the case were tried, the parties agreed that the sum required to be paid for the privilege of keeping a dog was a tax. That is true; but this statement in that respect was manifestly an expression of an opinion, and was not binding upon the court. The ordinances show that it was a license fee.

Judgment affirmed.

Mark M. MEHERIN, Assignee, etc., of California Steamship Company, Respt.,

v.

Thomas AMBROSE, Impleaded with J. N. Saunders, Constable, etc., Appt.

(131 Cal. 681.)

1. A purchaser at execution sale cannot defeat an action to compel him to comply with his bid, on the ground that the sale was not wholly for cash, as required by statute.
2. A suit to compel a purchaser at execution sale to comply with his bid cannot be defeated because the statute, upon such failure, requires a resale of the property, making the purchaser liable for the costs and deficiency, where he induced the officer to forego that course, gave his check for the balance, and received and retained a certificate of sale.
3. The return of the officer selling property under execution, that it sold for a certain sum, is not conclusive in favor of the purchaser that the price was paid.
4. That the property had been sold at a former execution sale under another judgment will not absolve a purchaser at execution sale from complying with his bid.
5. The judgment debtor may maintain a suit against the purchaser at execution sale to recover the excess of the bid over the amount of the judgment, upon the neglect or refusal of the officer to bring the suit until it is about to be barred by the statute of limitations,—especially where the officer has surrendered the evidence of indebtedness and become insolvent, and the liability of the sureties is exhausted.
6. Under a statute requiring the officer selling property under execution to return to the execution debtor any excess in the proceeds of the sale over the judgment, in case the officer takes a check for such excess, which he wrongfully surrenders to the purchaser, the judgment debtor may as equitable assignee maintain an action to enforce payment of its amount, against the purchaser, although he has recovered judgment against the officer for the amount, which has proved unavailing because of his insolvency.
7. Receipt of the officer's deed is not a condition to liability to comply with a bid at execution sale by one who has received the officer's certificate of sale.
8. In case an officer selling property at an execution sale takes a check for the excess of the bid over the judgment, the right of the judgment debtor as an equitable assignee to enforce payment of the check is governed by the statute applicable to the limitation of actions on written instruments, and not by that applicable to actions not founded on instruments in writing.
9. A creditor of an insolvent debtor, who bids in the debtor's property at an execution sale for an amount in excess of the judgment, cannot set off his claim against the amount of his bid to which the debtor is entitled.

NOTE.—As to right to set off insolvent's obligation upon claim in hands of receiver or assignee or trustee for creditors, see Merrill v. Cape Ann Granite Co. (Mass.) 23 L. R. A. 313, and note.

10. Any right which a creditor of an insolvent has to set off his claim against the surplus of his bid at an execution sale of the debtor's property must be exercised when he proves his claim in the insolvency proceedings against the debtor, and is waived by proving for and receiving a dividend on the whole amount of his claim.

11. A claim against an insolvent which has been proved in the insolvency proceedings has ceased to be an existing cause of action so as to be a valid counterclaim against a demand by the insolvent's assignee, where the statute provides that no creditor proving his debt shall be allowed to maintain any action therefor against the debtor.

(McFarland, Garoutte, and Harrison, JJ., dissent.)

(February 25, 1901.)

APPEAL by defendant Ambrose from a judgment of the Superior Court for Santa Barbara County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the balance alleged to be due on a bid for property sold at execution sale. Affirmed.

The case was first heard in department, and the judgment of the trial court was reversed, whereupon a petition for rehearing in banc was filed, after which the following opinions were handed down.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. A. Morgenthau, for appellant:

The sale was void because the money was not paid. Our statute provides that such sale must be for cash, and the sale referred to in the complaint was so advertised.

People ex rel. Kohler v. Hays, 5 Cal. 68; Asken v. Ebberts, 22 Cal. 264.

Unless the sale was for cash there was no sale.

Murtree, Sheriffs, 2d ed. § 993.

The return made by the constable is conclusive upon the California Steamship Company, and if false can only be corrected in the action where made.

Egery v. Buchanan, 5 Cal. 56.

To recover the purchase money for the sale of real property the deed should be tendered. The complaint should allege a tender of the conveyance.

Bohall v. Diller, 41 Cal. 533; Kelly v. Mack, 45 Cal. 303.

The statute of limitations cannot be avoided in a case where the facts are sufficient to put a person of ordinary intelligence and prudence on inquiry as to the truth.

Bills v. Silver King Min. Co. 106 Cal. 10, 39 Pac. 43; Vigoureux v. Murphy, 54 Cal. 346.

Meers, John Garber and R. Percy Wright, also for appellant:

The sheriff or constable who receives a bid at a sale under execution is the only person who can maintain an action to recover the amount unpaid by a purchaser on his bid.

Armstrong v. Vroman, 11 Minn. 220, Gil.

142, 89 Am. Dec. 81; Gaskell v. Morris, 7 Watts & S. 32; State v. Stelle, 103 Ill. 467; 15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. pp. 497, 498; Larned v. Carpenter, 65 Ill. 543.

No one can maintain an action upon a promissory note unless he has the legal title to it, and one who has an equitable right to a part of the proceeds when collected cannot sue thereon.

Curtis v. Sprague, 51 Cal. 239.

The respondent has never acquired any interest, either legal or equitable, in the money which the appellant agreed to pay to the constable for the property offered for sale by him on October 24, 1891.

If the action in the case at bar could be maintained by the respondent to recover from the appellant the balance of the sum bid by him at the constable's sale on October 24, 1891, it was not commenced until long after the statute of limitations had become a bar to it.

The check for $9,145, given by the appellant to the constable on October 24, 1891, was unlawful and void. The constable had no authority to receive anything but money in payment of the amount due on his bid.

Dazet v. Landry, 21 Nev. 291, 30 Pac. 1064; People ex rel. Kohler v. Hays, 5 Cal. 68; Askeo v. Ebberts, 22 Cal. 264; The Haytian Republic, 64 Fed. 215; Ex parte State and State Bank, 15 Ark. 263; State v. Lawson, 14 Ark. 114; Dickenson v. Gilliland, 1 Cow. 481; Gasquet v. Warren, 2 Smedes & M. 514; Jones v. Thacker, 61 Ga. 329.

The judgment debtor and the appellant could have entered into an express agreement that the constable should receive a check or a promissory note in payment of the amount due from the appellant in respect of his bid.

Mitchell v. Hockett, 25 Cal. 538, 85 Am. Dec. 151.

Without such agreement, however, the check or note would have no lawful consideration to support it, and the certificate of sale given by the officer would be illegal and void.

Liggett v. Firestone, 96 Ind. 260.

If the statute permitted a sheriff or constable to accept a check or a bill of exchange in lieu of money, in payment of the amount bid at an execution sale, the respondent could not maintain an action upon the check given by the appellant.

To maintain an action upon a check, or on a bill of exchange, the plaintiff must be the holder of it, and have the legal right to receive the money due and unpaid thereon.

Messrs. Grant Jackson and Mullany, Grant, & Cushing, for respondent:

In making and conducting sales under execution the officer acts as agent for the execution creditor to the extent of his judgment, and for the execution debtor to the extent of the surplus that may remain; and the contracts and proceedings by the officer with the purchaser are made and transacted 54 L. R. A.

It was as much the duty of this officer to collect this balance of $9,145 for the judgment debtor, whose property he sold therefor, as it was to collect the $855 for the judgment creditor.

Cooper v. Galbraith, 3 Wash. C. C. 546, Fed. Cas. No. 3,193; Swortzell v. Martin, 16 Iowa, 519; Conway v. Nolte, 11 Mo. 74; McKnight v. Gordon, 13 Rich. Eq. 222, 94 Am. Dec. 164; Kilgore v. Peden, 1 Strobb. L. 18.

Even where a resale can be made, it is optional with the officer whether he shall resell or not; and the purchaser is in no position to claim that his liability upon his bid should be substituted for a liability based upon the bid of another at a resale.

Armstrong v. Vroman, 11 Minn. 220, Gil. 142, 88 Am. Dec. 81; Robinson v. Garth, 6 Ala. 204, 41 Am. Dec. 47; Herman, Executions, § 211; 2 Freeman, Executions, § 313d; Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 695.

In making a sale under execution, the officer professes to sell only the interest or estate of the judgment debtor in the premises. He is not bound to convey with a warranty; neither does the law imply one.

Rorer, Judicial Sales, § 57; Cameron v. Logan, 8 Iowa, 434; Hamsmith v. Espy, 19 Iowa, 444; Dean v. Morris, 4 G. Greene, 313; Coyne v. Souther, 61 Pa. 457; Lang v. Waring, 25 Ala. 625, 60 Am. Dec. 533.

Even if the officer sold on credit at the instance of both the plaintiff and defendant, and a note was given for the purchase price, the failure of the title could not be set up as a defense to the note.

Kilgore v. Peden, 1 Strobb. L. 18; Rorer, Judicial Sales, § 60.

The officer owed the duty to collect this balance of the purchase price, to the judgment debtor, for whom this entire balance was to be collected.

On petition for rehearing.

The defendant Ambrose was not entitled, under any circumstances, to set off the indebtedness of the insolvent debtor against the check given to the constable for the purchase price of the property bought at the sheriff's sale.

Bump, Bankruptcy, 11th ed. p. 484; Freeman, Executions, § 300.

Assuming that Ambrose was entitled to set off against the check an equal amount due him from the judgment debtor, yet this was a privilege that Ambrose might or might not avail himself of, and Ambrose did not exercise this right or privilege.

Ambrose, having proved his demand, and having established it for the full amount in the insolvency proceeding, has not only exhausted the right and obtained all the relief pertaining to the demand, but has prevented himself from prosecuting the same demand by plea of off-set in the present action.

Beatty, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by the assignee of an insolvent corporation to recover from the defendants the unpaid balance of the sum bid by the defendant Ambrose for certain real property of the corporation which was sold under execution by the defendant Saunders. In the trial court Saunders made default, but Ambrose defended the action, and he now appeals from a judgment for the plaintiff, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The facts involved in several of the points argued by counsel are somewhat complicated, and may be more conveniently stated in detail as the discussion proceeds, but it will be necessary at the outset to indicate the general nature of the case. The defendant Saunders, a constable, in October, 1891, sold under execution certain real property of the California Steamship Company. Defendant Ambrose was the purchaser, and the amount of his bid was $10,000, of which he paid in cash $855. For the balance of $9,145 he gave Saunders his check on Donahue, Kelly & Co., and received from him a certificate of sale, which he thereafter retained. A duplicate certificate was duly recorded by Saunders. After getting his certificate of sale, Ambrose stopped payment of his check, and it was never paid, nor was any attempt ever made by Saunders to enforce payment. Within twenty days after said sale the steamship company was adjudged an insolvent, and in due course the plaintiff was appointed and qualified as assignee. Saunders having accounted for only $855 of the sum bid at the execution sale, the plaintiff commenced an action against him and the sureties on his official bond, in which he recovered a judgment against Saunders for the balance of $9,145, and against his sureties for $1,000, the full penalty of their bond. That judgment was affirmed by this court, and the opinion there delivered (110 Cal. 463, 42 Pac. 966) states the most important facts involved in the present litigation. On the trial of that action, in June, 1894, the plaintiff learned for the first time of the giving of the check by Ambrose to Saunders for the unpaid balance of his bid, of his subsequent stoppage of payment of the check, and of the redelivery of the check by Saunders to Ambrose, by whom it had been destroyed. On the affirmance of the judgment in Meherin v. Saunders and His Sureties, Ambrose paid the $1,000 due from the sureties, but nothing more has ever been paid on said judgment. The execution against Saunders was returned unsatisfied, and he was then, and has since continued to be, totally insolvent. In the opinion delivered in Meherin v. Saunders it was intimated that Saunders had a right of action against Ambrose to recover the balance of his bid at the execution sale, as undoubtedly he had; but he never took any steps to enforce payment, and thereupon the plaintiff commenced this action on September 28, 1895, less than a month prior to the date when an action on the check would have been barred by the statute of limitations. The trial court credited the defendants with $1,000, the amount paid by Ambrose on the judgment against the sureties of Saunders, and rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $8,145, and interest from October 24, 1891, the date of the execution sale and of Ambrose's check. On his appeal from the judgment and order denying a new trial, the defendant Ambrose assails both the findings and the conclusions of the superior court, and also contends that the complaint fails to state a cause of action. As to the findings of fact, we think they were in every material respect fully sustained by the evidence. The finding that plaintiff was not informed that Ambrose had paid only $855 on his bid prior to the trial of Meherin v. Saunders is contrary to the evidence, for it clearly appears that plaintiff received that information immediately after his appointment as assignee. The fact which first came to his knowledge during the trial of Meherin v. Saunders was not that Ambrose had failed to pay any more than $855, but that he had given a check on Donahue, Kelly & Co. for the balance of his bid; that he had stopped payment of that check, and afterwards got it into his possession and destroyed it. As to this matter alone the findings are contrary to the evidence, but the facts found and the actual facts are alike immaterial. In all other particulars there is substantial evidence to support the findings, though as to some matters there is a sharp conflict. The remaining points urged by appellant will be considered in their logical order.

1. He contends that the complaint shows that no sale of the corporation's property was made. The statute, he says, furnishes the exclusive rule for execution sales, and an essential part of the rule is that every such sale must be for cash, whereas this sale was made, at least in part, upon a credit. This, I think, is an objection to the sale which it does not lie in the mouth of the appellant to make, even if it were technically sufficient. But it is not sustained by the allegations of the complaint. They show that the sale was made as such sales are usually made, and in pursuance of the statutory notice. It was, therefore, a sale for cash; and Ambrose, by his bid, agreed to pay cash. There was no fault in the mode of conducting the sale, but merely a failure on the part of the appellant to perform his promise to pay. It is true that under the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 695) the constable, upon the refusal of appellant to pay the full amount of his bid, might have resold the property, in which case appellant would have been liable for the costs of the resale, and for any deficiency in the price realized, but the officer was induced by the appellant to forego this course. He accepted a check in lieu of cash upon the implied, if not the express, representation of appellant that it was the equivalent of cash. He issued and recorded a regular certificate of the sale. He applied the cash actually received to the satisfaction of the judgment under which the property was sold, and of other judgments, executions upon which he had in his hands. He made his return accordingly, and thereby made himself accountable to the steamship company for the full amount of appellant's bid. Meherin v. Saunders, 110 Cal. 463, 42 Pac. 966. Under these circumstances, it is too late for the appellant to say that there was no liability upon his part to pay the sum covered by his check. Besides, his liability is not a mere statutory liability, if there were any merit in that contention, but is a common-law liability arising out of an express promise to pay, based upon a good and valuable consideration.

2. The second proposition of appellant is that the California Steamship Company is concluded by the return of the constable to the effect that the property was sold for the sum of $10,000. If this proposition were conceded, it is difficult to see what bearing it would have on the present controversy; for the plaintiff, so far from contesting that part of the return, is insisting upon it, and is seeking only to recover the unpaid balance of the price bid. But I suppose the appellant means to claim that the return is conclusive in his favor that he paid the $10,000 in full. If so, the authorities he cites do not sustain his contention. They are to the effect that the return of an officer upon an execution is—with some important exceptions—conclusive upon the parties until vacated. But appellant was not a party to the action in which the execution issued, and is neither bound by the return nor protected by it. Whether he paid the bid or not is a question to be decided upon evidence aliunde.

3. The proposition is not distinctly advanced by appellant, but he seems to claim that he incurred no liability by his bid, because without his knowledge the property in question had been previously sold to another purchaser on execution under another judgment against the steamship company. It is true, the property had been sold a few days prior to the sale to appellant, but under a judgment which was a junior lien, so that the appellant by his subsequent purchase obtained the superior title. It would have made no difference, however, if the first sale had been under a prior lien; for the rule of caveat emptor applies to execution sales, and there would still have remained a right of redemption in the steamship company after the first sale. As it was, the purchaser at the first sale got only a right to redeem from the second sale, and this fact may account in some measure for the full price bid by the appellant.

4. It is contended that there is no privity of contract between the judgment debtor and the purchaser at the execution sale, such as is essential to sustain an action by the former to recover from the latter the unpaid surplus of his bid over and above the amount required to satisfy the execution. Upon this point counsel for respondent are challenged by appellant to cite a case in which a judgment debtor has ever recovered such surplus or balance in the absence of an express agreement between the debtor and purchaser. No case exactly in point is cited in response to this challenge, but the principles which support the position of the respondent are unquestionable. The right of the officer who conducts the sale to sue for the unpaid purchase money is not disputed, but it is claimed that he, and he alone, can maintain the action. Ordinarily, no doubt, the officer is the proper party to bring the action; for it is only by collecting the full purchase price that he can fulfil the commands of the writ. He stands in the position of a trustee as to the proceeds of the sale for all parties interested,—for the execution creditors, to the extent of their interest, and for the judgment debtor as to the surplus. He also has an interest in the fund to the extent of his fees and commissions. For these reasons such an action by the sheriff was sustained by the supreme court of Alabama. Robinson v. Garth, 6 Ala. 204, 41 Am. Dec. 47. But in that case the court said (p. 209): "We do not doubt that those for whom the sheriff acts, and who are interested in the money to be recovered, may also maintain the action," etc. The principle of that decision was that the sheriff, being the trustee of an express trust, could and ought to sue for the benefit of his cestuis, but that his right to sue did not exclude a similar right in the beneficiaries. In this case the trustee has utterly failed and neglected to sue, and the right of action was about to be barred by the statute when the beneficiary commenced this suit, making the trustee a party defendant, and alleging all the facts constituting his equitable right. He shows that the trustee is insolvent, that he has surrendered and permitted the destruction of the written instrument upon which the action could be most clearly sustained, that the liability of his sureties is exhausted, and, in short, that, without action on plaintiff's part, a large portion of the price of his insolvent's land will be irre-

coverably lost. It cannot be doubted that, if Saunders had sued in his own name and recovered the amount of appellant's check, he would have held the proceeds as trustee for plaintiff, and that every cent of it would have been assigned to the plaintiff by any insolvency court having jurisdiction of Saunders' estate, to the exclusion of his general creditors. It cannot be doubted that, if Saunders had commenced the action in his own name, the interest of plaintiff would have entitled him to intervene and take control of the litigation, upon the ground that he was the real party in interest, and more especially by reason of the insolvency of Saunders. These things being so I cannot understand why, upon showing the neglect of Saunders to sue, the plaintiff could not commence the action himself, making Saunders a party. The result is that the same parties are before the court that would have been before the court if Saunders had done his duty by commencing the action, and plaintiff had exercised his clear legal right by intervening. All the facts were fully disclosed by the pleadings, and the court was in a position to do full and complete justice in the premises. There is another sufficient answer to the technical objection of want of privity. By § 691 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is made the duty of the officer holding the execution, in the absence of other specific direction of the court, to return to the judgment debtor any excess in the proceeds of the sale over the judgment and accruing costs. In this case there was no specific direction as to the surplus, which was exactly represented by appellant's check. This check was not cash, and the judgment debtor could not have been compelled to take it. But that objection could have been waived, and, if waived, it would have been the duty of Saunders, under the statute, to transfer the check. It is, indeed, true that the plaintiff never formally demanded a transfer of the check (he never knew of its existence until it had been surrendered and destroyed), and he never waived his right to the cash; but his present action is founded upon the obligation arising out of the nonpayment of that check, and he is entitled to be treated as the equitable assignee. Equity deems that to be done which ought to be done. Saunders ought to have sued on the check, or to have assigned it to the plaintiff so that he could sue. Not having sued himself, he will be deemed to have assigned his right of action to plaintiff. Of this view he cannot complain, and still less can the appellant complain. The necessary privity of contract in this case is worked out by operation of law.

5. It is contended that the plaintiff cannot maintain this action because he does not show that he is willing or able to procure for the appellant the constable's deed. To sustain this proposition, counsel cites Bohall v. Diller, 41 Cal. 533, and similar cases. Such cases have no application here. A purchaser at execution sale must pay when the certificate of sale is delivered. He gets his deed in due course upon demand of the officer. Appellant received his certificate of sale at the date of the sale, and the whole amount of his bid was then payable.

6. If we are correct in holding that plaintiff can maintain this action as equitable assignee of defendant's check, or as the real party in interest, because of the default of his trustee, the plea of the statute of limitations is disposed of. The action was commenced within four years from the date of the check.

7. At the date of the execution sale the California Steamship Company was indebted to the appellant in about the sum of $27,000, upon which the appellant had commenced an action and issued attachments, which he had caused to be levied on the property which he afterwards purchased. The subsequent adjudication of the company's insolvency, made within thirty days after the commencement of that suit, dissolved the attachment, and appellant thereupon proved up his claim for the full amount in the insolvency court. This was done subsequent to his purchase at the execution sale, and after he had stopped payment of his check. In proving his claim in the insolvency proceedings he made no deduction on account of the unpaid balance of his bid at the execution sale, but asked and obtained the allowance of the whole of his original claim, undiminished, and when a dividend was declared by the assignee he claimed and received the sum apportionable to the full amount of his original demands. The dividend was only a fraction over 4 per cent of the company's indebtedness, however, and the amount still due the appellant is largely in excess of the unpaid portion of his bid at the execution sale. Upon these facts the appellant contends that the trial court erred in refusing to set off his claim upon the insolvent company against the present claim of plaintiff. To this assignment of error the respondent makes three answers: First, that Ambrose never had a right to set off his claim against the steamship company; second, that, if such right ever existed, he waived it at the time he should have exercised it; and, third, that he is estopped to claim a right of set-off by his claim and acceptance of the dividend in the insolvency proceeding on the whole amount of the original indebtedness of the steamship company. I think the position of the respondent must be sustained on every point.

This case presents a question very different from that which arises in the ordinary case of cross demands or mutual credits. The real question is not whether cross demands may be compensated by setting off one against the other, but is, rather, a question whether a creditor of an insolvent can by his unlawful act defeat the clear and undoubted policy of the insolvency laws, and give himself a preference over other creditors; whether, in other words, he can, against the will of the insolvent debtor, and in violation of his legal rights, secure a preference which could not be secured by their voluntary and concurrent action. Under the provisions of § 55 of the insolvency act, it is perfectly clear that if a debtor in contemplation of insolvency should make over to one of his creditors a valuable asset in consideration of the release of his demand,—the creditor having reason to know the debtor's condition,—the transaction would be set aside as a fraud upon the other creditors. And, if this is so,—if the insolvent cannot give a preference, when he desires to do so, by a voluntary transfer of his property,—it certainly must be allowed that the creditor cannot secure the same preference by unlawfully taking or withholding the property and offering to credit its value. This, however, is precisely what Ambrose is seeking to do in this action. The steamship company did not make a voluntary sale of its property on credit to Ambrose, or to anyone. The property was seized upon by an officer of the law who was empowered to sell enough of it to satisfy his execution, or to sell the whole of it for cash, and after satisfying the execution to return the surplus to the owner. If this course—the course enjoined by the law—had been pursued, the constable would not have taken Ambrose's check for $9,145 in lieu of cash, but would have taken the cash itself and paid it over to the company, by whom it would have been turned over to its assignee as a part of the fund for the satisfaction of the claims of its general creditors, including Ambrose. By imposing upon the constable, and violating the right of the steamship company to receive the cash, Ambrose seeks to put himself in the attitude of a debtor of the corporation, with a right to extinguish his indebtedness by a set-off, dollar for dollar, where other creditors must be content with a modest dividend. To sustain him in this position is to allow him to take advantage of his own wrong, and to hold that the policy and plain directions of the law can be defeated by a violation of the law. The doctrine of set-off is pre-eminently an equitable doctrine, and is none the less so by reason of its embodiment in our statutes. Upon a claim of set-off, equity will work out the result that would have followed if that had been done which ought to have been done. If Ambrose had paid the full amount of his bid, as he ought to have done, the plaintiff, as assignee of the insolvent corporation, would have had $9,145 to divide evenly between him and the other creditors. The result of this judgment is to bring about exactly that condition, while to allow the claim of set-off which he asserts would be to give him the whole $9,145, and leave the other creditors no part of it.

But, even if it were conceded that a right of set-off could exist under such circumstances, it is certain that the time to exercise it was when Ambrose proved his claim in the insolvency proceedings. If the cross demands were of such a nature that one compensated the other, he had no valid claim for more than the balance. But he claimed and was allowed the whole of his original demands, undiminished; and this allowance of his claim was, like a similar allowance in probate proceedings, the equivalent of a judgment,—a judgment to be paid in due course of administration. To make this claim and secure its allowance was, therefore, a solemn admission on his part that he had no right to set off the unpaid balance of his bid at the execution sale, but that he must discharge that liability in full, and content himself with the dividend apportionable to the full amount of his original demands. I think it clear that he was well advised in making this admission, and pursuing the course that he did. But, whether well or ill advised in this matter, he certainly went too far to recede when he claimed and accepted a dividend on the whole amount of his original demands. If the right of set-off existed, and the two claims compensated each other, he was entitled to a dividend on a balance of only about $20,000, but he claimed and accepted a dividend on over $29,000. That is to say, about one third of what he received was money to which he had no right, and it was money of which the other creditors were wrongfully deprived. For the purpose of drawing a dividend in the insolvency proceeding he acts upon the theory that there is no set-off, and that the cross demands are uncompensated. Having in this way appropriated to himself money that on his present theory belonged to other creditors, can he be allowed now to shift his ground, and upon a totally inconsistent theory withhold the fund out of which the other creditors would receive a dividend? It is to my mind clear that he cannot. He is estopped.

These views are, I think, amply sustained by authority, and even by the letter of our statutes. A counterclaim capable of being set off in an action must be in itself an existing cause of action. Was appellant's claim against the steamship company an existing cause of action when he sought to avail himself of it as a counterclaim? Section 45 of the insolvency act furnishes the answer to this question: "No creditor proving his debt or claim shall be allowed to maintain any suit at law or in equity therefor against the debtor, but shall be deemed to have waived all right of action and suit," etc. The case of Brown v. Farmers' Bank, 6 Bush, 198, is on all fours with this case. I quote the following from the opinion of the court of appeals: "And to the set-off so pleaded the plaintiff filed a reply, setting forth that before he brought this action the defendant had, in the proper proceedings which were pending in bankruptcy, presented and proved and verified for adjudication and allowance against the estate of each of said bankrupts the whole amount of each of said debts, without giving or allowing any credit on either of them for the $200.04 in controversy, and that said debts, having been proved in bankruptcy, were beyond the defendant's control. . . . In our opinion, proving the entire debts in the proceedings in bankruptcy, without offering to abate the claims by the amount of said deposit, was a waiver of the right to do so, and an election to proceed in said claims alone in the proceedings in bankruptcy, and that the subsequent assertion of part of the same debts by plea of set-off in this action was equivalent to the prosecution of an original suit upon the claims against the prohibition of the bankrupt law." Russell v. Owen, 61 Mo. 186, is a case of the same complexion, and this is from the opinion of the court: "The chief question for determination in this case is whether a creditor who, in making proof of his claim before the register in bankruptcy, omits to show that the bankrupt has an unsatisfied claim against him, can, when sued by the assignee for the amount of such unsatisfied and omitted claim, plead as a set-off the amount allowed by the register as a balance due to him. This question must receive a reply in the negative. . . . When a party defendant pleads a set-off, he, in effect, brings an action for the amount of that set-off, but by presenting and proving his claims before the register the creditor is to be deemed as waiving 'all right of action or suit against the bankrupt.' It would be clearly contrary, therefore, to the evident intent of the above-recited sections to allow a creditor to do that indirectly which the law precludes him from doing directly,—to accomplish by way of set-off that which he would be debarred from asserting in a direct action. The same view of this point is taken elsewhere. (Brown v. Farmers' Bank, 6 Bush, 198.)" And see notes to § 21, James, Bankrupt Law; Bump, Bankruptcy, 9th ed. 684, 11th ed. 491.

The superior court did not err in denying the right of set-off.

McFarland, J., dissenting:

I dissent, and think that the judgment should be reversed. Apart from the very close questions of law which arise in the case, by which, of course, it must be determined, it is proper to remark that it would be a great hardship to compel appellant to pay the large amount of money and interest claimed to be due respondent on the bid at the constable's sale. Appellant had advanced to the California Steamship Company large sums of money, at one time amounting to $86,000. At the time of the constable's sale the company owed appellant about $28,000. He paid $855 on his bid; he also paid $1,000 on the judgment recovered against the constable and his sureties; he also paid several hundred dollars on a former sale of the same property; and he not only loses all of this, with the exception of a very small percentage coming from the effects of the insolvent corporation, but must now pay in addition the amount of the present judgment, which is for $11,136.47 and interest. I think that it can be gleaned from the evidence that the bid of $10,000 was understood by the judgment debtor, by the constable, and by the appellant to be fictitious, except as to the amount necessary to pay off the judgment lien, $855, 54 L. R. A.

which sum appellant paid to the constable, and that the $10,000 was bid with the consent of all parties merely to enhance the apparent value of the property; appellant supposing that it would be deducted from the large amount of indebtedness from the company to himself. It is alleged in the complaint that the constable never demanded payment of the check given him by appellant for $9,145. The judgment debtor, before it went into insolvency, never made any objection to the nonpayment of the balance of the bid. Payment of the check was immediately stopped by notice of appellant, no demand was ever made on the bank on which it was drawn for its payment, and the check was destroyed. No proceedings were taken under § 695, Code Civ. Proc., to have the property resold. This action was not commenced until nearly four years after the date of the bid. There is no finding as to the actual value of the property, and no evidence going very directly to that point, but there is evidence tending to show that it had no value approaching the amount of the bid. Under these circumstances, the appellant should not be compelled to pay this large sum of money unless strict law inexorably demands it, and I do not think that there is such a demand.

As to the law governing the case, without considering the many other points made by appellant, I will merely say:

1. That in my opinion there was no privity of contract between the respondent and the appellant as to the alleged cause of action, and therefore respondent cannot maintain this action. There are many authorities supporting this view, but it will be sufficient to notice the cases of Galpin v. Lamb, 29 Ohio St. 529, and Adams v. Adams, 4 Watts, 160, and the cases referred to in the opinions in those cases. In Galpin v. Lamb the syllabus, which is a correct statement of the point decided, is as follows: "A judgment creditor cannot maintain an action against a purchaser of real estate at sheriff's sale to recover damages for the breach of the contract of sale." Of course, a judgment debtor is in the same position touching this point as a judgment creditor. In the opinion the court says: "The contract of purchase is made with the officer, as representing all the interests involved in the suit in which the judgment or decree of sale is rendered. He and the purchaser are the only parties to the contract of purchase, and he alone can maintain an action against the purchaser to recover the purchase money. The parties to the judgment or decree have different interests and stand in different relations to the property; some holding the relation of debtor, and others that of creditor. But, however numerous the parties or diverse their interests, the officer represents them all, and none of the parties stand in such relation to the contract of the purchaser as to entitle them to maintain an action on it." In Adams v. Adams the syllabus is as follows: "For a breach of contract between a sheriff and his vendee of land no action will lie in the name of anyone but the sheriff." In the opinion the court says: "The sheriff, in making the contract of sale with James Adams, was not acting as the agent of the plaintiff, nor yet of anyone else. He is considered the principal himself in such cases, and the legal as well as real party making the contract of sale. Although it be true that he acts in the character of a trustee, yet it must be borne in mind that it is as an officer of the law that he does so, and that it is from the law he derives all his power and authority; and, in sales of property made by him as sheriff under this authority, he alone has the right to receive the money arising therefrom, and is responsible for the legal appropriation of it, unless it is brought by him into court for that purpose. It would inevitably produce great confusion and clashing of suits to permit other persons besides the sheriff in their own names to maintain suits against a sheriff's vendees for breaches of their contracts made with him. It would also be inconsistent with every principle of analogy in the law." I have seen no cases where the point was directly involved which are in conflict with the above authorities.

2. Under any view, the action, in my opinion, is barred by the statute of limitations. The alleged action is based upon the bid made by appellant at the sale, and not upon a written instrument, and it cannot be brought within any category of actions not barred in at least three years.

Garoutte, J., dissenting:

I concur generally in the views of Mr. Justice McFarland, but would add an additional suggestion. Though the concession is opposed to all the authorities, let it be assumed that the constable took this check from Ambrose as agent or trustee of the plaintiff,—an act clearly beyond the scope of his authority. Upon this concession, the plaintiff then had either one of two courses open to him: He could ratify the constable's act and take the check, or he could repudiate it and hold him liable for the money he should have received at the sale. Here plaintiff elected to follow the latter course, and recovered judgment against the constable for the full amount of the unpaid purchase price. Having done so, he lost all rights he may have had to the check, and forever afterwards it became the property of the constable. Plaintiff had no right to sue the constable for the unpaid purchase price, and also claim title to the check. These two remedies were absolutely inconsistent with each other, and the adoption of one was a bar to the prosecution of the other. If the plaintiff had taken an assignment of the check from the constable in the first instance, he could not thereafter have sued the constable for the unpaid purchase price; and having first sued the constable for that purchase price, he never thereafter was entitled to an assignment of the check. Conceding that when the first action was brought he did not know that the check was in existence, still that fact is immaterial, for he did know that the purchase price had not been paid. The foregoing views we believe to be supported by the language of the principal opinion, wherein it is said: "This check was not cash, and the judgment debtor could not have been compelled to take it. But that objection could have been waived, and, if waived, it would have been the duty of Saunders, under the statute, to transfer the check. . . . Equity deems that to be done which ought to be done. Saunders ought to have sued on the check, or to have assigned it to the plaintiff so that he could sue. Not having sued himself, he will be deemed to have assigned his right of action to plaintiff. Of this view he cannot complain, and still less can the appellant complain. The necessary privity of contract in this case is worked out by operation of law." Conceding the foregoing quotation to contain a sound exposition of the law, then the plaintiff, after having brought his action against the constable for the full amount of the purchase price and recovered judgment, would never be declared by the law to be the equitable assignee of the check. It was thereafter the property of the constable, and the plaintiff had no right or title in it. This action cannot be maintained for a moment unless upon the theory that it is an action upon the check. The statutes of limitation absolutely forbid it. The check being the property of the constable, the action must fail.

Harrison, J., dissenting:

The complaint herein is based solely upon the obligation of the appellant to pay the amount of his bid, and upon the right of the plaintiff, as the assignee of the judgment creditor, to recover that amount from him. After setting forth the facts showing the capacity in which the plaintiff brings the action, and the circumstances attending the bid, and its nonpayment, it is alleged that the plaintiff is the owner of and entitled to recover the whole amount "due to the defendant Saunders, as such constable, from the defendant Ambrose on said bid;" and the court finds, as the fact upon which it rendered judgment against the appellant, that the plaintiff is entitled to have and recover the amount "so due and payable to the defendant Saunders, as such constable, from the defendant Ambrose, on said bid, and now due to this plaintiff, as such assignee in insolvency." The plaintiff's entire cause of action rests, therefore, upon the appellant's refusal to pay the amount of his bid. The complaint is framed upon the theory that the amount bid was due from the appellant to the officer, and that by reason of the officer's neglect and default the plaintiff is entitled to maintain a direct action against the appellant for its recovery. I think it is very clearly shown in the opinion of Mr. Justice McFarland that there is no privity between the officer and the judgment creditor, by which the latter is authorized to maintain an action against the purchaser for the amount of his bid; but, if it be conceded that such privity does exist, the creditor can have no greater right of action than could the officer. The plaintiff has no other cause of action against the appellant than such as existed in favor of his assignor, the steamship company; and that company's right of action, if any existed, accrued October 24, 1891, at the time when the appellant purchased the property at the constable's sale. If the plaintiff's right to maintain the action is to be sustained upon the ground that he is the real party in interest, his right of action can be no greater than that of him who conducted the transaction under which he derived his interest, and by virtue of which he claims to be the interested party. If the appellant would not have been liable to Saunders under the facts alleged and found herein, the plaintiff can have no right of recovery against him. It is very evident that Saunders could not have maintained any action against the appellant for the recovery of the amount of his bid unless it was commenced within two years after the date of the bid; and it is equally clear, upon the facts alleged and shown herein, that at the time the present action was commenced Saunders could not have maintained any action against the appellant upon the check. Not only is it alleged in the complaint that he made no demand for the payment of the check, and that he declined to collect it, but it is also shown that when he received it he inclosed it in an envelope and deposited it in the bank "for safe-keeping" and afterwards, and before the commencement of this action, withdrew it and surrendered it to the appellant. He had the same right to surrender the check to the appellant as he would have had to refuse to receive it at the time of the bid. Having thus voluntarily parted with it, he could not thereafter maintain any action upon it, and his only right of action against the appellant would have been for the recovery of the amount of his bid.

The only reason assigned in the opinion of the Chief Justice for sustaining the action, as against the plea of the statute of limitations, is that the plaintiff is the equitable assignee of the check. No adjudicated case is cited in support of this proposition, nor are any rules applicable to the principles governing equitable assignments invoked in its support. The action herein is not upon the check, and the allegations in the complaint, as well as the evidence offered at the trial, and the findings of the court in reference thereto, do not assert any right in the plaintiff by virtue of the check, but are clearly evidentiary statements of the transaction, inserted merely for the purpose of showing that the appellant had not paid the full amount of his bid. Not only does the complaint fail to set forth any right of action upon the check, but, as if with the intention not to do so, avoids any claim to the check by reason of its having been received by the officer. After alleging that he accepted it "in lieu of the balance of the purchase price" bid by the appellant, the complaint sets forth that the officer deposited it in the bank of Lompoc, "where, as this plaintiff is informed and believes, 54 L. R. A.

the said check has ever since been, and is now, deposited and remains." Although it was shown at the trial that the check had been withdrawn from the bank and surrendered to the appellant before the commencement of the present action, the above allegation shows that, although the plaintiff then believed that it still remained in the custody of the bank, he made no effort to get possession of it or to make it the basis of his action, but relies upon the liability of the appellant for the amount of the purchase money, and thus destroys his right to be regarded as the equitable assignee of the check. An officer making a sale has no right to accept anything but money from the bidder, or to give credit to the purchaser. If he does so, however, he acts in his individual capacity, and not as an officer, and is liable in his individual capacity equally as if he had in fact received the money. The judgment creditor may affirm the act of the officer in accepting the check or other obligation of the purchaser, instead of money, and thus be estopped from questioning the sufficiency or correctness of the officer's act, but unless he does so accept it he does not acquire any right or title thereto. To say that because he might have accepted the check it may be assumed that he did accept it, upon the ground that equity deems that to be done which ought to be done,—especially when he makes no claim that he was willing to accept it,—is to apply this rule in a manner for which I think no authority can be found. The act of the plaintiff in bringing the former action against the officer, in which he charged him with having received the money upon the bid and obtained judgment therefor, is conclusive against any claim that the plaintiff waived the officer's obligation to receive money upon the bid, and that he was willing to accept the check in its stead. His election of remedies at that time precludes him from maintaining the present action, as is shown in the opinion of Mr. Justice Garoutte.

If the remedy provided in § 695, Code Civ. Proc., in case the purchaser refuses to pay the amount bid by him, is not exclusive, the officer's right of action is limited to a suit for the recovery of the amount of the bid. Such an action is a pure common-law action, resting upon the common-law liability of the purchaser upon his bid, and presents no room for invoking the principles of equity, and the rights of the creditor derived by virtue of his privity with the officer can be no greater than those of the officer; but whether the obligation of the appellant is by virtue of the statute, or rests upon his common-law liability, is immaterial. His obligation is not "founded" upon an instrument of writing, and any action to enforce such obligation must be commenced within two years after his liability accrued. Chipman v. Morrill, 20 Cal. 130; McCarthy v. Mount Teate Land & Water Co. 111 Cal. 328, 43 Pac. 956; Thomas v. Pacific Beach Co. 115 Cal. 136, 46 Pac. 899.

As the present action was not commenced until more than two years after the right of action accrued, the defendant's plea of the statute of limitations should have been sustained.

Rehearing denied.

Re Estate of Henry K. WINCHESTER, Deceased.

An unincorporated society can take a bequest, leaving out of consideration the elements of a charity.

Re Ticknor, 13 Mich. 43; Boone, Corp. Pony Series, § 52.

Chipman, C., filed the following opinion:
Henry K. Winchester died testate February 21, 1895. In his will he provided as follows: "I give to the Santa Barbara Natural History Society of Santa Barbara, California, the sum of two thousand dollars." At the time of his death, and until June 28, 1898, this society was an unincorporated organization, on which latter date the members of the society duly incorporated under the laws of this state. The incorporated society petitioned the court for a decree of partial distribution, which was granted by the court, and from this decree the executors appeal on the judgment roll alone.

The court found the following facts: That the petitioner "was organized as a society in the year 1876, and ever since continued to be, up to the time of its incorporation as hereinafter mentioned, a regularly organized, unincorporated society, governed by a constitution and by-laws adopted by the members thereof, having regularly elected officers, and holding regular meetings, and having for its object to advance the study and promote knowledge of the various branches of natural history by holding meetings, providing for lectures, and establishing a museum of natural history specimens, and was known as and called the 'Santa Barbara Natural History Society,'" that "on June 28, 1898, the members of said society formed a corporation under the laws of this state, the petitioner herein, and said society has ever since continued to be, and now is, a duly-organized corporation, known as and called the 'Santa Barbara Society of Natural History,'" the purposes were declared to be similar to those for which the original society was formed, although stated in different terms; and, among other things, it was provided that the society "shall hold in possession real estate, and funds contributed as annual dues and by voluntary subscriptions." It was also found that all of the devises and bequests to charitable or benevolent societies, taken collectively, do not exceed one third of the estate; that distribution to various legatees has heretofore been made, amounting in all to 89.38 per cent of the amount to which said legatees were entitled, but no part of said legacy of $2,000 has been paid; that petitioner rented a building from the executors at the monthly rental of $12.50, no part of which has been paid; that said legacy is subject to an inheritance tax. As conclusions of law, the court found that the bequest is a valid bequest to charitable uses, binding upon the estate of deceased; that petitioner was, as it existed at the time said will was executed and at the date of the decease of the testator, and has ever since continued to be, and now is, capable of taking said legacy; and it was decreed that the executors pay to petitioner 89.38 per cent of said legacy of $2,000, after deducting $325, the amount due as inheritance tax and interest. The rental due from petitioner to said executors was decreed to be $325.

Appellants present two questions: First, Can an unincorporated society, other than a mutual benefit association, take a bequest by will in this state? Second. If it cannot, 54 L. R. A.

can it, upon incorporating subsequently to the death of the testator, claim the legacy which while unincorporated it could not take?

Appellants concede that the promotion of the knowledge of natural history is a charitable object, and it is also conceded that in the courts of last resort in several states bequests directly to unincorporated societies having charitable objects in view are upheld, but it is contended that the better reason is with the decisions in those states denying the power of such societies to take charitable bequests. Appellants say: "We do not claim that unincorporated societies are incapable of taking because of 'the indefiniteness of the beneficiaries.'" "This," as respondent says, "is an essential element of a charity. The public at large was to have been benefited by the promotion of the knowledge of natural history. But the trustee must be such that he can be held accountable." It is also conceded that where no trustee is named the court may appoint one. "But in this case," it is claimed, "the testator has designated a trustee. And this trustee, being an unincorporated society, cannot be held to a performance of the trust. And yet to take the bequest from the trustee named, and to give the fund to others, would be to exercise that prerogative power under the rule of cy pres, . . . which is denied to our courts,"—citing Hinckley's Estate, 58 Cal. 497. I have given the position of appellants thus fully, as it narrows the inquiry very much. Appellants err in assuming that the unincorporated society, being named as the grantee, thus becoming in a certain sense the trustee, cannot be held to a performance of the trust. Mr. Perry says: "These bodies or quasi corporations [referring to churches, societies, conferences, yearly meetings of Friends, and families of Shakers, and other organizations] have been considered so far under the control of a court of equity that they would be compelled to execute the duties of the trust imposed upon them, and could be dealt with for a breach." 2 Perry, Tr. § 730.

Appellants also err in assuming that the case involves the necessity of invoking the rule of cy pres to the full extent as applied in England, in order to uphold the bequest. The legatee at the testator's death, and long prior thereto, was an existing organization, composed of certain known members, governed by a constitution and by-laws, and having officers chosen to conduct the business affairs of the society and to carry out its objects. The society had a name by which it was known, and under which its purposes were effectuated, and the bequest was made to the society by this name. Of the intention of the testator there can be no question. He intended to aid the study of natural history through this particular society, by giving to it the amount of money named in his will. The use being charitable, the purpose and the donee certain and definite, equity will not allow the trust to fail for want of a trustee to enforce it, should such interposition of the court become necessary. In Re Upham, 127 Cal. 90, 59 Pac. 315, the testator bequeathed the residue of his estate "to the legally qualified and constituted trustees or managers of the Good Templars Orphans' Home of Vallejo, . . . in trust for the use and benefit of the orphan children of said institution." It was contended that, because the home was unincorporated, there were no trustees named capable of taking. The court said: "These trustees seem to be appropriate persons to take charge of this charitable fund, and manage it for the purposes of the trust; but even if it should be held that, in a strict legal sense, they are not capable of taking, yet the charity would not fail for that reason. A court will not allow a charitable trust to fail for want of a legal trustee." Russell v. Allen, 107 U. S. 163, 27 L. ed. 397, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 327, and Schmidt v. Hess, 60 Mo. 591, are cited approvingly. In the first of these cases it was said: "If the founder describes the general nature of the charitable trust, he may leave the details of its administration to be settled by trustees under the superintendence of a court of chancery; and an omission to name trustees, or the death or declination of the trustees named, will not defeat the trust, but the court will appoint new trustees in their stead." In the Missouri case the grantor deeded certain land to the Lutheran Church for purposes of a burial ground, and delivered the deed to his son-in-law. The trustees of the Evangelical Lutheran Trinity Church brought the action to have vested in themselves, as such trustees, the title to the property. Evidence was admitted to identify the claimants with the church to which the grantor was attached, and which it was his intention to aid. It was said in the opinion: "Although, in consequence of the non-incorporation of the church for whose benefit the grant was made, there was no one in esse at the time of making the donation capable of being the recipient of the trust, yet, the use being a charitable one, a court of equity, having ascertained the intent of the grantor, will not allow the grant on that account to fail, but will see to its effectuation." American Tract Soc. v. Atwater, 30 Ohio St. 77, 27 Am. Rep. 422, is an instructive case. A bequest in trust for the benefit of the parents of the testator was created. He directed that upon the death of his parents the trust should cease, and that his trustee should distribute certain remaining funds as follows: "To apply the same so that it may be used for the interests of religion, and for the advancement of the Kingdom of Christ in the world, as follows, to wit: He shall pay to the treasurer of the American Tract Society the sum of one thousand dollars." Similar directions were made as to three other societies. The court points out that the testator conceived a scheme for advancing Christ's Kingdom in the world, and carried it out by directing the money to be paid to the various societies, and that as soon as the money arrived at their treasuries the scheme was accomplished and the will fulfilled. The court said: "It is not as though he bequeathed to a trustee for the purpose of advancing the Kingdom of Christ. He bequeaths to these societies, because they are advancing the Kingdom, which is the precise object he wants to accomplish. He first states the object he wishes to effect, and then states how he proposes to effect it. He is willing to pay the money direct to them. To them he trusts that they will forward his cherished idea. As said, the societies themselves are the direct beneficiaries of the trust, although, if they should attempt to use their money for purposes altogether foreign to those for which they exist, doubtless they might be restrained to those purposes,—not by reason of anything in the will, but because they should be restrained to the purposes for which they were created." Again, it was said: "The testator has created these societies an agency to carry out his scheme. He has given them power over the application of his bounty, and the exercise of that power relieves the bequest of all objections made on account of vagueness or uncertainty." Again: "Although the testator uses the names of the treasurers, this is only his mode of designating the societies to which he desires his money to go." In Carter v. Balfour, 19 Ala. 814, the will read: "I give one thousand dollars to be paid at my wife's death, and to be divided in equal proportions viz.: The Baptist Societies for Foreign and Domestic Missions and the American and Foreign Bible Societies. And at my sister Emily's death, if the boy Mike, given to her during her lifetime, be alive, he shall be sold to the best advantage, and the proceeds of the sale equally divided between the societies above named." It was insisted that these bequests must fail because the societies were merely voluntary associations, unincorporated and incapable by law of taking bequests, and that there is no trustee to take for them, and, further, that the object was too vague. The opinion proceeds: "I think these descriptions sufficiently specific, and, if societies can be found which were organized and known by those named at the time of the testator's death, they should be considered the societies referred to by the will, and capable of taking the bequests, whether incorporated or not. In making the gifts to the societies by their names, I think it clearly and necessarily inferable that the gifts were intended to be made to them in their aggregate capacity, and for the purposes for which they were organized, and that the testator could not have intended the gifts for the individual members of the societies, or he would have made the bequest to them by their individual names in the ordinary way. It must be presumed that the testator knew for what object the societies were formed and that he intended to have the funds applied to that object." The opinion then shows that these bequests would be sustained independently of the statute of Elizabeth, and, after an examination of the authorities, concludes: "But I think the weight of American authority is decidedly in favor of such bequests." The learned justice who wrote the opinion reviews the cases pro and con, and devotes especial attention to the leading case holding adversely, namely, Philadelphia Baptist Asso. v. Hart, 4 Wheat. 1, 4 L. ed. 499, and his conclusion was that the same court has partially, if not altogether, overruled the Philadelphia Baptist Asso. Case. It was expressly held in the Alabama case that there was no occasion for invoking the doctrine of cy près, and it was said: "The bequests should be paid only to the societies specified in the will, or their authorized agents. If the societies, or either of them, did not exist at the time of the testator's death, or cannot now be found, organized and known as above stated, then the bequest to such society or societies should be considered and disposed of as lapsed legacies." We do not deem it necessary to refer further to the cases, of which there are many, holding similar views. See 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 918. We are satisfied with the reasoning that has led to the upholding of bequests such as the one before us. Indeed, we think the decision may rest alone on the conclusion reached in Re Upham, 127 Cal. 90, 9 Pac. 315. The fact that in that case the bequest was to the trustees of the orphans' home, and not directly to the orphans' home, makes no difference. In either case the intention would be the same, and the capacity to take would be the same.

We do not decide, nor is it necessary to so hold, that the subsequent incorporation of the society would add anything to its capacity to take at the death of the testator. The bequest would have been binding on the estate had there been no incorporation. But as the society now has a corporate existence, and the present members are the same as the members of the unincorporated society, and the objects are the same, there can be no objection to its receiving the gift. Preachers' Aid Soc. v. Rich, 45 Me. 552. We discover nothing in Grand Grove, U. A. O. of D. v. Garibaldi Grove, No. 71, 130 Cal. 116, 62 Pac. 486, necessarily in conflict with the views herein expressed. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

trouble of laying this cement pipe on its end, instead of on its side, no amount of effort on the part of these children could have budged it an inch; but, laid as it was, on its side, in a place where children play, it was a temptation that few children would resist, to roll it along on the ground.

No appearance for defendant in error.

Wilson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought to recover damages on account of the death of a minor child of the plaintiffs, alleged to have been caused through the negligence of the defendant company. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint on the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and, this being sustained, the plaintiffs stood upon their complaint, and brought the case here for review. The complaint substantially alleges that the defendant, in the prosecution of its business as a manufacturer of cement pipe, was possessed of certain lots or parcels of land in a thickly-populated portion of the city of Denver, and upon a portion thereof had stored a large quantity of cement piping; that said parcel of land adjoined the public streets, and there was no fence or guard dividing the same therefrom, and that the same, and the piping stored thereon, was in constant view from the street; that among the pieces of piping so exposed, and near to the public highway, was one of the diameter of $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet, only 2 feet in length, and of the weight of from 500 to 700 pounds; that said piece was at the time of the accident, and for a long time previous thereto had been, lying on its side in such manner that it could be rolled easily over the surface of the ground, and that by reason of its great diameter, excessive weight, and short length, was, when so lying, topheavy, and easily turned from its side to its end, and that the piping so exposed was a temptation to children who had not arrived at years of discretion and judgment to play therewith, and that children did frequently play with it, and that it was, by reason of the facts stated, a dangerous instrument, all of which the defendant well knew; that upon the date of the accident in question, while the child of plaintiffs, in company with eight or ten others, all residing in the immediate neighborhood, and all too young to realize the danger that they incurred, was playing with this short and heavy piece of piping, the son of plaintiffs being inside of the piping and being rolled over the surface by the other children, the piping suddenly fell from its side to its end, catching his body underneath, and inflicting injuries which caused almost immediate death.

The defendant making no appearance, we have not been favored by its counsel with 54 L. R. A.

their views as to the particular defects in the complaint which, in their opinion, render it insufficient. Whether they claim it to have appeared upon the face of the complaint that the plaintiffs did not have a cause of action, or that it failed to state some matter necessary to have been stated in order to have constituted a cause of action, we are not advised. We have made as thorough an examination of the complaint as we could without the critical assistance of counsel, and, in our opinion, it does state a cause of action, and was not subject to demurrer on the general ground of its insufficiency. That the plaintiffs would have a right to recover if the allegations of the complaint be accepted as true, or should be sustained upon trial, is, we think, without question. The case comes clearly within the principles laid down by the United States Supreme Court in the Turntable Case, which has been universally accepted as authority. Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745. A few of the well-considered and leading cases which have affirmed and followed the doctrine there announced are Union P. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 38 L. ed. 434, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 619; Powers v. Harlow, 53 Mich. 507, 51 Am. Rep. 154, 19 N. W. 257; Brinkley Car Co. v. Cooper, 60 Ark. 545, 31 S. W. 154; Biggs v. Consolidated Barb-Wire Co. 60 Kan. 217, 44 L. R. A. 635, 56 Pac. 4; Schmidt v. Cook, 4 Misc. 85, 23 N. Y. Supp. 799; Keffe v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393; Cooley, Torts, chap. 10, p. 303. The complaint alleges the danger in leaving the piping exposed as it was, and in fact it may be said, as was said in the Turntable Case, the fact of the fatal injuries being received therefrom by the son of the plaintiffs in this case shows the danger. It also alleges that this unprotected exposure was a temptation to children of immature years to play with the piping, and that defendant knew this to be the case, and knew that the young children of the neighborhood were in the habit of playing with it. By these averments the complaint charged negligence upon the part of the defendant sufficient, if true, to support a recovery by plaintiffs in accordance with the rule announced by Circuit Judge Dillon in the Stout Case in his charge to the jury, which was expressly approved by the supreme court on appeal. He said: "But if the defendants did know or had good reason to believe, under the circumstances of the case, that the children of the place would resort to the turntable to play, and that if they did they would or might be injured, then, if they took no means to keep the children away, and no means to prevent accidents, they would be guilty of negligence, and would be answerable for damages caused to children by such negligence." [2 Dill. 294, Fed. Cas. No. 13,504.] If it be said that the complaint itself shows that the piping was upon private premises, that the children were trespassers, and that they were not upon the land by invitation or consent of defendant, it may be answered, as it was by Chief Justice Cooley in Powers v. Harlow, 53 Mich. 507, 51 Am. Rep. 154, 19 N. W. 257, and approved by all of the authorities that we have cited: "Children, wherever they go, must be expected to act upon childish instincts and impulses; and others who are chargeable with a duty of care and caution towards them must calculate upon this, and take precautions accordingly. If they leave exposed to the observation of children anything which would be tempting to them, and which they, in their immature judgment, might naturally suppose they were at liberty to handle or play with, they should expect that liberty to be taken." Or as was tersely and pithily expressed in the Minnesota case [Keffe v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393]: "What an express invitation would be to an adult, the temptation of an attractive plaything is to a child of tender years." Or, as was forcibly said by the Kansas supreme court in Price v. Atchison Water Co. 58 Kan. 551, 50 Pac. 450: "To maintain upon one's property enticements to the ignorant or unwary is tantamount to an invitation to visit and to inspect and enjoy; and in such cases the obligation to endeavor to protect from the dangers of the seductive instrument or place follows as justly as though the invitation had been express." If an owner sees fit to keep on his premises something that is an attraction and allurement to the natural instincts of childhood, the law, it is well settled, imposes upon him the corresponding duty to take reasonable precautions to prevent the intrusion of children, or to protect from personal injury such as may be attracted thereby. The case of Schmidt v. Cook, 4 Misc. 85, 23 N. Y. Supp. 799, was very similar to this. In that the child was injured by the falling of a flagstone, which was leaning against a fence, and with and about which she was playing. It was contended that the complaint should have been dismissed on account of the contributory negligence of the child, because it was her own act that caused the rock to fall. The court held that the contention was contrary to the principle announced in the Turntable Case. Contributory negligence sufficient to defeat a recovery does not appear from the facts stated in the complaint. It might, it is true, be made to appear by the evidence at the trial, it being shown that the child was possessed of sufficient judgment and discretion to have realized the danger of playing with the piping in the manner in which it did; but that question is not presented here. In applying the rule that he who seeks to recover damages for a personal injury suffered from the negligence of another must not himself be guilty of negligence that substantially contributed to the result, the law discriminates between children and adults, the feeble and the strong, and only requires of each the exercise of that degree of care to be reasonably expected in view of his age and condition. Reynolds v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 248; Union P. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 38 L. ed. 434, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 619. It is not the contributory act, merely, but the contributory negligence, of a plaintiff that will prevent his recovery; and the care and caution required of a child being according to its maturity and capacity only, this must be dependent upon and be determined by the circumstances of each particular case. Schmidt v. Cook, 4 Misc. 85, 23 N. Y. Supp. 799; Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745. Another leading case cited approvingly by the United States Supreme Court upon the question as to liability for injuries suffered by a child, even when it was a trespasser, is Lynch v. Nordin, 1 Q. B. 29.

We think that we have said all that is necessary to express our views plainly and in such a manner that they may be easily understood, upon the only question presented. The principles upon which we base them have been most elaborately discussed in the authorities which we have cited. For the reasons given, the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with leave to the defendant to further plead, as it may be advised.

Reversed.

ERROR to the Court of General Sessions for Newcastle County to review a judgment convicting defendant of lewdly and lasciviously playing with an infant child. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William S. Hilles and Josiah Marvel, for plaintiff in error:

Evidence of the prisoner's good character is always admissible. In doubtful cases,—as, where there is a conflict of testimony on material and essential points, or where the evidence for or against the accused is pretty nearly balanced,—former good character, if proved, is entitled to due weight, and should incline the scales in favor of the prisoner.

State v. Manluff, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 208.

It has been held that proof of good character is available only in doubtful cases, for the purpose of showing that the accused had not a wicked or evil intent at the time the act complained of was committed; that the reputation for good character, however excellent and irreproachable, should not be allowed to weigh against positive, direct, and uncontradicted evidence.

State v. Vines, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 424; State v. Smith, 9 Houst. (Del.) 588, 33 Atl. 441; State v. Davis, 2 Penn. (Del.) 139, 45 Atl. 394.

Such doctrine is not a correct statement of the law.

Sir William Russell discusses the matter as follows: It has been usual to treat the good character of the party accused as evidence to be taken into consideration in doubtful cases only. It is, however, submitted, with deference, that the character of the party accused, satisfactorily established by competent witnesses, is an ingredient which ought always to be submitted to the consideration of the jury, together with the other facts and circumstances of the case.

2 Russell, Crimes, 785; Reo v. Stannard, 7 Car. & P. 673; 1 Wharton, Crim. Law, §§ 643, 644.

Whatever may have been said in some of the earlier cases to the effect that evidence of the good character of the defendant is not to be considered unless the other evidence leaves the commission in doubt, the decided weight of authority now is that good character, when considered in connection with the other evidence in the case, may generate a reasonable doubt. The circumstances may be such that an established reputation for good character, if it is relevant to the issue, would alone create a reasonable doubt, although without it the other evidence would be convincing.

Where good character is a fact in a case, it should be weighed in connection with the other evidence, and it may alone suffice to create a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury.

Gillett, Indirect & Collateral Ev. § 298; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 25; Rice, Ev. §§ 371-375.

An honest man may, through malice or otherwise, be charged with crime, and his life or liberty be endangered by fallacious circumstances or perjury, and he may be able to produce no evidence to prove his innocence except his own oath. If, in such case, a blameless life and unstained character are of no avail,—are a mere make-weight in a doubtful case,—his condition is a sad one. But, fortunately for the upright man so situated, we have got beyond all doubt upon this subject, and have firmly established the doctrine that evidence of good character is to be regarded as a substantive fact, like any other fact tending to establish the defendant's innocence, and ought to be so regarded both by court and jury.

Hanney v. Com. 116 Pa. 322, 9 Atl. 339. Messrs. Robert C. White, Attorney General, and Peter L. Cooper, Jr., Deputy Attorney General, for defendant in error.

Boyce, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Jacob A. Daniels, the plaintiff in error, was tried and convicted in the court below upon the charge of unlawfully and lewdly and lasciviously playing with Viola Yeatman, a female child under the age of sixteen years. There are seven assignments of error. The second, third, and fifth are directed to the refusal of the court to charge the jury as requested by the second and third prayers, and to the instruction by the court to the jury instead, respectively; and they were considered together in the argument. They present the main subject of controversy in this case. This being so, it renders a discussion of the remaining errors assigned unnecessary, although we may say that, upon a careful consideration of each of them in connection with the evidence produced and the law applicable to the case, they should not be sustained.

The third error assigned is directed to the third prayer requested, which was properly refused by the court in that it assumed a fact.—i. e., “the defendant being a man of good character,”—which, under the evidence in this case, was a question exclusively for the determination of the jury. It remains, therefore, to consider: (1) The refusal by the court to instruct the jury, as requested by the second prayer, to wit: “The jury should take into consideration the evidence of the witnesses as to the good character of the defendant as of any other substantive fact tending to establish the defendant’s innocence or guilt, and if, after considering it in connection with all the other evidence in the case, they have a reasonable doubt of this guilt they should return a verdict of not guilty.” (2) The instruction which was given by the court to the jury instead, to wit: “We have also been asked to charge you as to the matter of good reputation. We will say that, when good character is proved, and the evidence is doubtful,—hanging in the scales, as it were,—so that you do not know which way to decide it, in such a case good reputation, when proved, should inure to the acquittal of the defendant. But when the testimony is positive and distinct, and the offense is clearly and satisfactorily proved, good reputation is of little value. Good men sometimes fall, and men who have borne a good reputation, and have never before, perhaps, done a bad act, even these sometimes, in the erratic working of human nature, commit crimes; so that we say that evidence of good reputation is only available in cases of doubt. Even then it must be proved to your satisfaction.” It is the correctness of this instruction as a rule of law that is disputed. We will first review the reported cases in this state bearing upon the subject. And it may be said that there has not been an unvarying, uniform rule with regard to the weight and value of character evidence in the courts of this state. The doctrine that “proof of good character is available only in doubtful cases,” and that “the reputation for good character, however excellent and irreproachable, should not be allowed to weigh against positive, direct, and uncontradicted evidence,”—following the evident intent and meaning of the instruction given to the jury in the case of State v. Manluff, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 208, 217,—was for the first time unequivocally and unmistakably laid down in the case of State v. Vines, Houst. Crim. 54 L. R. A.

Rep. (Del.) 424, 431. The case of State v. Williamson, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 155, 164, seems to be the first reported case in this state in which the jury were instructed by the court upon the subject of character evidence. And the instruction given is not so clear in its meaning and effect as the instructions upon the same question contained in the two cases which have just been cited. The language of the court is as follows: “If, however, the jury should not be satisfied from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that such was the case, they should acquit the prisoner, for he would be entitled to the benefit of any reasonable doubt they might have that such were the facts of the case; and, should they entertain such doubt the proof of his good character should determine that doubt, and the question of his guilt or innocence of the crime charged against him, in his favor.” The language employed in the charge would seem to indicate that the evidence of good character was submitted to the jury together with the other evidence, without any qualification or disparagement, and that the jury were left untrammelled to determine upon the whole evidence in the case whether or not they entertained “a reasonable doubt.” It is true that they were told that, “should they entertain such a doubt, the proof of his good character should determine that doubt.” Without criticising the instruction or commenting upon its uselessness, because of the familiar rule in criminal law that “a reasonable doubt” inures to the acquittal of the accused, it will be observed that the instruction as given did not restrict the evidence of good character and its availability to “doubtful cases.” In an earlier case than any which we have as yet cited,—being the case of State v. Horskin, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 116,—it is said in the statement of the case that “the character of the prisoner as a peaceable and quiet man was proved by several witnesses called in reply.” The court did not allude to this evidence in the charge, the concluding part of which is as follows: “The evidence, however, was before them, and it was for them alone to decide what were the facts and circumstances proved in the case. . . . They should give the prisoner, however, the benefit of any reasonable doubt they might have in the case.” The evidence of good character, therefore, seems to have been submitted to the jury, in connection with the other evidence, as any other fact or circumstance in the case. In the case of State v. Horner, 1 Marv. (Del.) 504, 516, 26 Atl. 73, 41 Atl. 139, decided in 1893, the court departed from the general language used in the first two cases cited above, and also that used in the subsequent cases which were followed substantially by the court below, to express the rule with regard to character evidence. The court said: “If, from the testimony as presented by the other witnesses, you are in doubt as to the guilt of the accused, then you may take into consideration the evidence of the witnesses as to their good character;” thus excluding from the consideration of the jury the evidence of such character until they should first determine whether they had a doubt as to the guilt of the accused upon the other evidence, which is the effect of the instruction given by the court below upon the evidence of good character in the present case. But the court added: "And you may consider whether it is more likely, under all the circumstances of this case, that Jerry Sullivan should be testifying to untruths, than that the defendants, being men of good character, should be guilty of the offense with which they are charged;" thus manifestly leaving the jury under this branch of the instruction to consider the evidence of good character in connection with the testimony of the principal witness, without that discrimination contained either in the first part thereof or in the instruction given by the court below in the present case. And the jury were left to consider the evidence of good character as a circumstance in the case in connection with the testimony of the principal witness, and to determine whether it was more likely that the latter had testified falsely than that the defendants, if the jury should find that the evidence sustained their good character, should be guilty of the offense charged. It therefore appears from a close examination of the reported decisions in this state that the rulings of the court respecting character evidence have not been altogether uniform. Yet it is, nevertheless, true that the charge of the court below has the authority of precedent. State v. Manluff, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 208, 217; State v. Smith, 9 Houst. (Del.) 588, 597, 33 Atl. 441; State v. Brown, 2 Marv. (Del.) 401, 36 Atl. 458; State v. Davis, 2 Penn. (Del.) 139, 142, 45 Atl. 394. And because of these former decisions in support of the instruction which was given in this case, the deputy attorney general, representing the state, invoked the doctrine of stare decisis against a reversal of the case at bar.

Before the adoption of the Constitution in 1897, vesting this court with the jurisdiction to issue writs of error to the court of oyer and terminer and to the court of general sessions, and to determine all matters in error, the last-named courts were each, within their respective criminal jurisdictions, courts of last resort, possessing original and final jurisdiction in all those criminal matters, vested in them without any supervisory or appellate control of a higher court. And the decisions of said courts, touching the weight and availability of character evidence, which were followed by the court below, constitute the only barrier to an examination de novo of the relation of such evidence to the other evidence in the case. The salutary effect of uniformity, certainty, and stability in the law, and the perplexing difficulties and inconvenience to the public were it otherwise, are the chief reasons for the doctrine of precedents. And we may say that the decisions heretofore deliberately made by our criminal courts, recognized and confirmed as many of them have been by subsequent decisions made therein, appeal to this tribunal with its enlarged jurisdiction with peculiar force, and they should not be disregarded lightly, nor will this court depart from any of these unless it be satisfied that they are clearly erroneous, and that to sustain them would be to perpetuate error. The doctrine of stare decisis has recently been discussed and applied by this court in the case of Truston v. Fitt & S. Co. 1 Penn. (Del.) 483, 42 Atl. 431. The court, by Ridgely, J., said: "The maxim of stare decisis has generally been strictly applied where titles to real estate have been acquired or commercial usages have been established under decisions of the court.

... But where a decision contravenes a plain principle of law, or where, in such decision, the law has been misunderstood or misapplied, and a reversal will not disturb property rights already acquired, or make innovations on established commercial usages, it may then become the duty of the judges to reverse an erroneous decision of the same court." Chancellor Kent says: "Even a series of decisions are not always conclusive evidence of what is law, and the revision of a decision very often resolves itself into a mere question of expediency, depending upon the consideration of the importance of certainty in the rule and the extent of property to be affected by a change of it." 1 Kent, Com. 476. The rule stare decisis seems to apply with peculiar force to decisions which have determined questions respecting real property and vested rights, and it embraces as well those matters of general commercial importance which tend to influence future business transactions. It has been said that the doctrine has greater or less force according to the nature of the question decided. Those questions where the decisions do not constitute a business rule—e. g. as where personal liberty is involved—will be met only by the general consideration which favors certainty and stability in the law. Downer v. Miller, 15 Wis. 612.

An examination into the question respecting the proper relation of character evidence when admitted to any other evidence in the case, although a rule touching such evidence has been established by former decisions in our criminal courts, does not involve any of those essentially important rights and interests, whether public or private, which are especially favored by stare decisis; and this court is not bound to adhere to the rule which was followed by the court below, if, upon an investigation, it be found to be manifestly erroneous in that it contravenes a plain principle of the law of evidence. And therefore we may proceed to consider the main question now before us: Is proof of good character a fact or circumstance in the particular case for the consideration of the jury in connection with all the other evidence produced, or is it available only in cases where the jury are in doubt of the guilt of the accused upon the other evidence? It may be said at the outset that character evidence is not a defense. It is a circumstance in the antecedent conduct and habits of the accused, the object and possible effect of which, when proved, is to strengthen the presumption of innocence with which the law clothes every person charged with the commission of a crime; and such evidence will vary in force and value according to the other facts and circumstances surrounding each particular case. Harrington v. State, 19 Ohio St. 264; People v. Ashe, 44 Cal. 288. Historically speaking, the admissibility of evidence of good character, or "reputation," as it is sometimes called, was at first restricted to capital cases only, but it is now settled law that the accused may put his character in issue or not in all criminal prosecutions where punishment for the offense charged is the purpose thereof. 2 Starkie, Ev. 7th Am. ed. 304; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 25. And in the earlier cases the weight of such evidence was limited to cases of doubt as to the guilt or innocence of the accused upon the other evidence. This doctrine, adhered to by the court below in this case, obtains in a few of the jurisdictions in this country; and it has been said that the practice of so charging juries, both here and in England, undoubtedly grew up when judges were accustomed to express their opinions to juries upon the weight and effect of testimony. Com. v. Leonard, 140 Mass. 473. 54 Am. Rep. 485, 4 N. E. 96; State v. Henry, 50 N. C. (5 Jones, L.) 65. Text writers in this country, as well as in England, are quite in accord in criticising this doctrine as a rule of law, maintaining that it is illogical, and not consonant with sound reasoning. Mr. Greenleaf, in his treatise on Evidence, says: "The admissibility of this evidence has sometimes been restricted to doubtful cases, but it is conceived that, if the evidence is at all relevant to the issue, it is not for the judge to decide before the evidence is all exhibited whether the case is in fact doubtful or not, nor, indeed, afterwards; the weight of the evidence being a question for the jury alone." 3 Greenl. Ev. § 25. Sir William Russell says: "It has been usual to treat the good character of the party accused as evidence to be taken into consideration only in doubtful cases. Juries have generally been told that, where the facts proved are such as to satisfy their minds of the guilt of the party, character, however excellent, is no subject for their consideration, but that, when they entertain any doubt as to the guilt of the party, they may properly turn their attention to the good character which he has received. It is, however, submitted with deference that the good character of the party accused, satisfactorily established by competent witnesses, is an ingredient, which ought always to be submitted to the consideration of the jury, together with the other facts and circumstances of the case. The nature of the charge, and the evidence by which it is supported, will often render such ingredient of little or no avail, but the more correct course seems to be not in any case to withdraw it from consideration, but to leave the jury to form their conclusion up- 54 L. R. A.

on the whole of the evidence whether an individual whose character was previously unblemished has or has not committed the particular crime for which he is called upon to answer." 2 Russell, Crimes, 704. And the celebrated English lawyer (afterwards an eminent jurist), Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, commenting upon this passage from Russell on Crimes, said: "We may be permitted to add that, according to the language frequently adopted by judges in their charges, it may be proved that character is, in no case, of any value. They say that in a clear case character has no weight, but if the case be doubtful—if the scale hangs even—the jury ought to throw the weight of the character into the scale, and allow it to turn the balance in the prisoner's favor; but the same judges will tell juries that in every doubtful case they ought to acquit, stopping far short of the even balance, and that the prisoner is entitled to the benefit of every reasonable doubt. In clear cases, therefore, the character is of no avail, and in doubtful cases it is not wanted. It is never to be considered by the jury but when the jury would acquit without it. The sophism lies in the absolute division of cases into clear and doubtful, without considering character as an ingredient which may render that doubtful which would otherwise be clear. There may certainly be cases so made out that no character can make them doubtful, but there may be others in which evidence given against a person without character would amount to conviction, in which a high character would produce a reasonable doubt; nay, in which character will actually outweigh evidence which might otherwise appear conclusive. It is in truth a fact varying greatly in its own intrinsic value. . . . according to the proofs to which it is opposed, but always a fact, fit, like all other facts proved in the cause, to be weighed and estimated by the jury." Dickinson. Quarterly Sessions. 6th ed. 563; Wharton. Crim. Ev. 9th ed. § 66. Without multiplying citations from law writers, further reference is made to Best, Ev. by Chamberlayne, 7th Am. ed. § 362; Bishop, Crim. Proc. 3d ed. § 115; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 867; 11 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 346; and Gilbert, Indirect & Collateral Ev. 298.

There is also an overwhelming weight of authority to be found in the adjudicated cases in support of the doctrine which, as we have shown at much length, is maintained by the text writers. In the case of State v. Daley, 53 Vt. 442, 38 Am. Rep. 694, the court, quoting from 1 Sarkie. Ev. 75, that character evidence "ought never to have any weight except in a doubtful case," said: "If this is law, all such evidence might as well be excluded; for, if the case is doubtful before its introduction (and that is the undoubted meaning of the quotation), the respondent is entitled to an acquittal without it; if the jury have a reasonable doubt of the prisoner's guilt, it is their duty to acquit, hence the evidence becomes unnecessary; and, if Mr. Starkie is correct in his proposition where the case is not doubtful upon the other evidence, it is not entitled to any weight, and so would be needlessly in the case." And Judge Cooley, in the case of People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 97 Am. Dec. 162, quoting the same passage from Mr. Starkie, said: "Such instructions are well calculated to mislead. Good character is an important fact with every man. . . . In every criminal trial it is a fact which the defendant is at liberty to put in evidence, and, being in, the jury have a right to give it such weight as they think it entitled to." In the case of State v. Henry, 50 N. C. (5 Jones, L.) 66, the court said: "It is not a rule of law that in a plain case the jury must not consider the evidence of the prisoner's good character, and that it is only 'in a doubtful case that he has a right to have it cast into the scales and weighed in his behalf.' . . . The true rule is that the testimony is to go to the jury and be considered by them, in connection with all the other facts and circumstances, and, if they believe the accused to be guilty, they must so find, notwithstanding his good character." A dictum in the case of People v. Stewart, 28 Cal. 396, to the effect that, "after the evidence is all in, the court may, as a matter of law, instruct the jury that evidence as to previous good character is not entitled to any weight except in doubtful cases," was rejected in the case of People v. Ashe, 44 Cal. 238, the court saying: "The good character of the prisoner, when proved, is itself a fact in the case. It is a circumstance tending, in a greater or less degree, to establish his innocence, and is not to be put aside by the jury, in order to ascertain if the other facts and circumstances, considered by themselves, do not establish his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt." In the case of Com. v. Hardy, 2 Mass. 303, it was held that "in doubtful cases a good general character, clearly established, ought to have weight with a jury, but it ought not to prevail against the positive testimony of credible witnesses." And in the celebrated case of Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711, a distinction was drawn between accusations of "great and atrocious criminality" and those of "smaller offenses," and it was said, "against facts strongly proved, good character cannot avail," but in smaller offenses, such as "pilfering and stealing," "where the evidence is doubtful, proof of character may be given with good effect." Both of these decisions were disapproved in the case of Com. v. Leonard, 140 Mass. 473, 54 Am. Rep. 485, 4 N. E. 96, and the court said: "It is not now the law, we think, that evidence of character can only be considered by the jury where the other evidence is doubtful. . . . and we think it [the old practice of charging juries that evidence of character was of little or no weight except in doubtful cases] ought not to have been made a rule of universal application; 54 L. R. A.

that is, a rule of law." Without citing at length from other numerous adjudicated cases, we refer to a few of them: State v. Northrup, 48 Iowa, 583, 30 Am. Rep. 408; Com. v. Wilson, 152 Mass. 12, 25 N. E. 16; Harrington v. State, 19 Ohio St. 264; Felix v. State, 18 Ala. 720; State v. House, 108 Iowa, 68, 78 N. W. 859; People v. Hughson, 154 N. Y. 153, 47 N. E. 1092; Remsen v. People, 43 N. Y. 8; Maclin v. State, 44 Ark. 115; State v. Sauer, 38 Minn. 438, 38 N. W. 355; Edgington v. United States, 164 U. S. 361, 41 L. ed. 467, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 72; Rowe v. United States, 38 C. C. A. 496, 97 Fed. 779.

The doctrine of the instruction, which, because of the preponderance of the adjudicated cases by our courts respecting evidence of good character, was consistently and naturally followed by the court below, is sophistical and illogical; and its inconsistency is clearly demonstrated by the distinguished law writers and jurists whom we have quoted, perhaps at too great length. The effect of the doctrine is first to exclude from the jury the consideration of the evidence of good character, although permitted to go before them as competent testimony, until they shall have determined whether they are in doubt as to the guilt of the accused upon the other evidence, in which event the jury are told, as in this case, that "good reputation, when proved, should inure to the acquittal of the defendant," the misleading character of which is obvious; and it is coupled with another objection equally misleading and erroneous,—it is, "when the testimony is positive and distinct, and the offense is clearly and satisfactorily proved, good reputation is of little value." The effect of the instruction is to make character evidence unnecessary and useless under the first branch thereof, and of no avail under the latter part. Such evidence, therefore, might as well be excluded altogether. We think that it is something more than "a mere makeweight in doubtful cases;" and that proof of an unblemished character may, under all the facts and circumstances of the particular case, create a doubt in the minds of the jury, when without it they would have no doubt; and that it is, at least, a circumstance in every case, when proved, to be weighed and estimated by the jury according to the weight of the testimony by which it is supported in connection with that to which it is opposed.

The serious matter of reversing a series of former decisions in order to reach a correct rule of law is our justification for the time and space which we have occupied in our effort to present sound and convincing reasons therefor.

We are unanimously of the opinion that there was error in the instruction as given, and we therefore reverse the judgment, and remand the case to the court below.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

John B. DANIEL, Piff. in Err.,
v.
COUNTY OF PUTNAM.

(.....Ga.....)

*There is no authority of law for officials in charge of the financial affairs of a county to purchase vaccine matter, and make the cost of the same a charge against the county.

(May 23, 1901.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Putnam County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the value of certain vaccine matter furnished by plaintiff for defendant's use. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Turner & Preston, for plaintiff in error:

The state is not authorized by the constitution to levy taxes and expend money for this purpose under its power to tax for the support of the state government and public institutions. But it is covered by that section which provides that counties may levy taxes and expend public funds to pay for quarantine.

The word "quarantine" should not be taken in its original meaning, which simply related to the detention of persons who had been exposed to contagious diseases for a period of forty days, but in its modern acceptance, covering every scientific means for the prevention of the spread of such diseases.

Where a county contracts within its legitimate competency it may be sued on such contract.

Bartow County Comrs.* 94 Ga. 216, 21 S. E. 516; Cook v. DeKalb County, 95 Ga. 218, 22 S. E. 151.

Mr. S. T. Wingfield, for defendant in error:

Counties have no common-law liability.

County authorities have no powers except those expressly granted.

No constitutional rights are, or can be, involved in this case, as was done in the case reported in Smith v. Floyd County, 85 Ga. 420, 11 S. E. 850, because no private property was taken or damaged by the county, as a public corporation, for the public use.

Millwood v. DeKalb County, 106 Ga. 743, 32 S. E. 577; Bailey v. Fulton County, 111 Ga. 314, 36 S. E. 596.

The furnishing of vaccine matter to the different counties is peculiarly and properly a duty of state government, (1) from the reason and necessities of the case; and (2) because such is the declared policy of our law.

Act 1793, Prince, Dig. p. 273; Act 1836, Prince, Dig. p. 277; Act 1843, Cobb, Dig. p. 377; Act 1865, p. 88, codified in Political Code from §§ 1472-1476; Central R. Co. v. State, 104 Ga. 831, 42 L. R. A. 518, 31 S. E. 531.

A tax to support the state government clearly carries with it the right to levy a tax to pay for vaccine matter to be furnished to the different counties of the state, (1) because the procuring and furnishing this matter are clearly an important function of state government; and (2) because the law makes this the duty of the state through its governor.

The plaintiff brought an action in the statutory form against Putnam county upon an open account for "vaccine points" furnished the defendant. At the trial he offered an amendment to his petition, in which he alleged: "The goods, the value of which is sued for, were certain vaccine points furnished to and for the use of the county of Putnam through and by the orders of the commissioners of roads and revenues of said county, and which were actually received and used by and for the benefit of the county; and the contract which said county authorities made to pay for said goods so purchased was one authorized to be made by the Constitution of the state and the laws passed in conformity therewith, and was within the legal competency of the county; and said debt so created is one for which the county may levy and collect taxes to pay, and therefore the county is liable to suit therefor." The court refused to allow the amendment, and sustained a motion to dismiss the petition on the ground that it did not set forth a cause of action. Without stopping to inquire whether the amendment should have been allowed, and granting, for the sake of the argument, that it should have been, the case really turns upon whether taking the petition and the amendment together, a cause of action was stated. The counties of this state can only raise revenue by taxation for certain specified purposes. They can only levy taxes within the limitations of and for the purposes specified in the Constitution. Article 7, § 6, ¶ 2, of the Constitution (Civil Code, § 5892) provides: "The general assembly shall not have power to delegate to any county the right to levy a tax for any purpose, except for educational purposes in instructing children in the elementary branches of an English education only; to build and repair the public buildings and bridges; to maintain and support prisoners; to pay jurors and coroners, and for litigation, quarantine, roads, and expenses of courts; to support paupers and pay debts heretofore existing." Under this paragraph of the Constitution, did the commissioners of roads and revenues of Putnam county have authority to bind the county by a contract with the plaintiff for the purchase of "vaccine points," to be furnished by him "for the use of the county" in preventing the spread of the smallpox within its borders? Clearly they could not bind the county by the creation of a debt for the payment of which it has no power to levy a tax. It is perfectly plain that they had no power to bind the county in this matter, unless the word "quarantine," as used in the above-quoted paragraph of the Constitution, is broad enough in its meaning to include the purchase of vaccine matter to be used in preventing the spread of the smallpox. The plaintiff recognizes this, and contends that the vaccine matter which he furnished to the county authorities was purchased and used by them for "quarantine" purposes. We do not think that this is a sound contention. To quarantine persons infected with or who have been exposed to the smallpox is one way of preventing the spread of the disease in a community; to vaccinate people who are not infected with the disease, in order that they may become immune therefrom, is another way of accomplishing the same purpose. But vaccination is one thing, and quarantine is another. To quarantine persons means to keep them, when suspected of having contracted or been exposed to an infectious disease, out of a community, or to confine them to a given place therein, and to prevent intercourse between them and the people generally of such community. Persons who are merely vaccinated, and then allowed to go when and where they please and to mingle freely with the other members of the community, are in no sense of the word quarantined. The preventive measure adopted in their case tends to protect them both from contracting the disease and from being quarantined. It is true that the object sought to be accomplished in each instance is the same,—the prevention of the dissemination of the disease in the community; but the means resorted to for this purpose in the one instance is different from the means resorted to in the other. The Constitution gives to the authorities of a county the power to raise money by taxation for defraying expenses incurred in using one of the methods of prevention, but gives them no power to thus raise money to pay expenses incurred in resorting to the other method. Neither does the statutory law undertake to authorize county authorities to purchase vaccine matter for the purpose of vaccinating people residing in such county, and thus checking or preventing an epidemic of smallpox. "The ordinary of each county, or the corporate authorities of any town or city in this state, within the limits of which the smallpox has appeared, or may appear, are authorized and empowered to provide a suitable hospital for those so afflicted, and to furnish them with medical or other attention that in their judgment those so afflicted may require." Pol. Code, § 1472. "Such ordinary or corporate authorities may also provide proper quarantine regulations to prevent the spread of said disease: provided, that no person shall be forced to leave his or her home to go to the hospital aforesaid, when they are properly provided for and guarded at their own expense; said court shall not pay any expense of any case so situated." Id. § 1473. "Said ordinary or corporate authorities shall make, or cause to be made, a proper and just account of all expenses accruing from such quarantine and other attention, either medical or nursing, of all they may have under control, and who submit to the regulations of said court or corporate authorities." Id. § 1474. These sections contain all the power conferred upon county authorities in reference to providing and enforcing measures to prevent or check an epidemic of smallpox. It will be seen that they deal only with the subject of quarantine. The ordinary is empowered to provide a hospital for those afflicted with the smallpox, and to furnish them (not the members of the community at large) with medical or other attention that, in his judgment, those so afflicted may require. He is not authorized to furnish people outside of the hospital, and not afflicted with the disease, with medical or other attention. He cannot furnish vaccine matter and employ physicians to vaccinate the outsiders. He can provide regulations to prevent the spread of the smallpox, but the regulations must be quarantine regulations. He is required to make or cause to be made a proper and just account of all expenses accruing from such quarantine and other attention, either medical or nursing, of all that he may have under control, and who submit to the regulations which he has provided. While he has power, by the enforcement of regulations prescribed for the purpose, to keep the people at large away from the smallpox hospital and from other places where persons afflicted with the disease may be confined under guard, it cannot be said that he has the people of the county generally under control; and the expenses of quarantine and other attention, either medical or nursing, which he is authorized to incur, and of which he must render a proper and just account, are limited to the cases of those whom he may have under control, and who submit to the quarantine regulations.

The law has not, however, left the counties of this state powerless to procure vaccine matter to be used in preventing or checking the spread of the smallpox. Section 1475 of the Political Code provides: "The governor is authorized and required to procure the necessary quantity of genuine vaccine matter, either by purchase or manufacture, at such reasonable compensation as he may contract for, and have the same transmitted to the ordinaries of each county in this state for immediate use." So far as we have been able to ascertain, the scheme of the law in this state has never been for each separate county to bear the expense of furnishing vaccine matter for the purpose of preventing the spread of smallpox within its limits, but it has been for the necessary vaccine matter to be paid for by the state. Originally the state also undertook to pay all reasonable and necessary expenses incurred in preventing the spread of smallpox within its borders, by reimbursing local communities which had incurred expenses for this purpose. See act of December 14, 1793 (Acts 1793, vol. 1, p. 392; Prince, Dig. p. 270); preamble to act of December 26, 1831 (Acts 1831, p. 245; Prince, Dig. p. 276); report of legislative committee and resolutions adopted December 4 and approved December 6, 1834 (Acts 1834, pp. 308-311); act of December 26, 1836 (Acts 1836, pp. 29, 30); act of December 29, 1836 (Acts 1836, p. 181). This policy was changed by the act of December 9, 1843, which repealed "all laws and parts of laws requiring the expenses incurred on account of smallpox and other pestilential diseases to be paid from the state treasury," and required the governor to "cause a supply of vaccine matter to be purchased and kept on hand at different and convenient places throughout the state, to be furnished to the people gratis, for inoculation," the same to be paid for "out of the contingent fund." Acts 1843, p. 168. By the act of December 13, 1862, the state returned to its old policy of paying the reasonable and necessary quarantine expenses incurred by county and corporate authorities. That act also contained substantially the same provisions as those which we have quoted from our present Political Code, including the section requiring the governor to procure the necessary quantity of genuine vaccine matter, and have the same transmitted to the proper county authorities for immediate use. Acts 1862-63, pp. 33, 34. The act of April 17, 1863, after providing how claims arising under the act of 1862 should be established and settled, declared that that act should no longer be of force, except for the purpose of settling claims that might have arisen under it. Acts 1862-63, p. 162. The act of February 5, 1866, substantially re-enacted the provisions of the act of 1862, except the section of the latter act requiring the state to pay the necessary quarantine expenses incurred by county and municipal authorities, and empowered the inferior courts or municipal authorities to levy an extra tax sufficient to defray all just and equitable debts contracted under its provisions. Acts 1865-66, p. 88. The same provisions that are contained in the Political Code are found in the Codes of 1868 and 1873, and the Code of 1868 also contained a section requiring the quarantine expenses incurred by the counties and municipal corporations to be paid from the state treasury; the codifiers having apparently overlooked the fact that these provisions of the act of 1862 were repealed by the act of 1863. This mistake was corrected in the Code of 1873. When the Constitution of 1877 was framed the law still required the governor to procure a sufficient quantity of genuine vaccine matter, and furnish the same to the ordinary of each county in the state as necessity might demand. In view of this fact, and the history of our legislation in reference to the prevention of smallpox, it seems very evident that the word "quarantine," as used in the paragraph of the Constitution which provides for what purposes counties may levy taxes, was not intended to have any more than its usual and legitimate meaning, and that it cannot be held that a purchase of vaccine matter, to be used to prevent the spread of smallpox in a county, was made for "quarantine" purposes, within the meaning of the word "quarantine" as used in the Constitution. The county of Putnam had no power to incur a debt for the vaccine points which the plaintiff claims to have furnished it. Consequently, if its commissioners of roads and revenues made such a purchase from the plaintiff, the county is not bound by their act. It follows that the court below committed no error in sustaining the motion of the defendant to dismiss the plaintiff's action.

Judgment affirmed.

The words "summary proceedings" designate those proceedings before judicial tribunals which are of an immediate, speedy, or peremptory nature. Proceedings are said to be summary when they are short and simple in comparison with regular or formal proceedings, from which they usually differ in that the aid of a jury is dispensed with.

Little, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Western & Atlantic Railroad Company and others presented a petition to the judge of the superior court of Fulton county, in which it was alleged that on February 7, 1901, certain employees of the city of Atlanta, acting under the direction of its board of health, began to forcibly take up and remove the floor of the building in that city known as the "Union Passenger Depot," which is used as a railway station by all the railroads passing through or having terminals in said city. The board of health based its action on the ground that the floor sought to be removed was a nuisance endangering the public health. The petition also alleged that the floor, which was of wooden plank, was in good sanitary condition, and in the same condition in which it was when the building was erected, and when the property was leased to the plaintiffs by the state, whose property it was and is, and that they had always kept the floor in good repair, substituting new plank for the old whenever necessary; that the board of health had ordered them to remove the floor, and place in its stead an asphalt floor, or one pleasing to the board, but because it was unnecessary, and would be very expensive, and for other reasons specified, they did not comply with this order; that not until January, 1900, was there any complaint calling the attention of the plaintiffs to the sanitary condition of the floor; that about that time surface water in the streets, caused by excessive rainfalls, partially flooded the floor, and the plaintiffs, supposing that this gave rise to the complaint, and desiring that the remedy adopted should conform to the views of the city authorities, requested the city engineer to prepare plans for the draining of the surface water, which he did, and these plans were carried out in the construction of sewers, after which nearly all the planks in the floor were removed, and new plank substituted, and since that time the floor has not been flooded. The petition further alleged that the board of health had no jurisdiction over the question as to whether the condition of the floor was a nuisance or not; that this is a judicial question, and the plaintiffs were entitled to be heard before their property could be condemned and abated as a nuisance; that there was no legal notice of any action proposed to be taken by the board of health necessary to condemn the floor as a nuisance; that, after the repairs above mentioned were made, no action of any kind was taken by the board of health declaring the condition of the floor as it existed on February 7, 1901, to be a nuisance; and that under the law applicable to the city of Atlanta the board of health has no power to determine the question as to what constitutes a public nuisance, Atlanta being a city of more than 20,000 inhabitants, and jurisdiction as to what constitutes a nuisance being vested in another tribunal. It was alleged that thus removing the floor of the building will result in great inconvenience to the traveling public, and in irreparable damage to the plaintiffs, and that the individuals doing the damage were insolvent. The defendants, in their answer, denied the allegations of the petition as to the sanitary condition of the floor, and set out their reasons for treating it as a nuisance. They contended that under the existing conditions at the depot a suitable floor could not be made of wooden plank. They averred that under the charter of the city the board of health is vested with authority to abate nuisances summarily and without resort to judicial proceedings, and that this authority is not affected by the general law; that, in accordance with authority granted by the charter, the mayor and general council of the city adopted an ordinance providing that the board of health "shall have full power and authority to require the owner or occupant of a lot in the city to remove or remedy anything on said lot which, in the opinion of the board, may endanger the public health, and on failure of the owner or occupant to remove or remedy the same the board shall direct the chief sanitary inspector to do so at the cost of said owner or occupant;" and that the removal of the depot floor was undertaken in accordance with the authority thus granted. It was denied, however, that the board was proceeding arbitrarily, and without notice to the plaintiffs. The answer averred that more than a year before the action complained of the board ordered the plaintiffs to remove the floor because of its unsanitary condition, and the plaintiffs, through their representatives, appeared before the board, and admitted that the floor was in this condition, and that a plank floor could not be kept in sanitary condition, and agreed that if, by December 1, 1900, no definite plans for the construction of a new depot should be agreed on, they would proceed without further delay to construct a permanent floor of granitoid, asphalt, or other material, satisfactory to the board of health; that the board, after the thorough investigation then had, adjudged that the condition of the floor was a nuisance, and directed the chief sanitary inspector to make cases in the recorder's court against the plaintiffs, and to abate the nuisance, unless it was remedied; that shortly before December 1, 1900, and at different times afterwards, the board of health communicated with the plaintiffs as to the condition of the floor, urging compliance with this agreement, and received assurances from the plaintiffs' representatives in charge of the depot (known as the "board of control") that the agreement would be carried out, and at their instance more time was granted them, the last extension granted being until February 2, 1901, but no further action was taken by the plaintiffs, except to request a delay until February 7th, and on that date the defendants, deeming it useless to delay further, undertook to remove the floor, and replace it with a permanent floor of such character as would be sanitary, and prevent the accumulation of water in and about the building. The evidence submitted on the question as to whether the condition of the depot floor was a nuisance endangering the public health was conflicting. The court admitted in evidence, over the objections of the plaintiffs, a resolution of the board of health, adopted February 2, 1900, declaring the condition of the depot floor to be a nuisance; an agreement by the board of control, representing the plaintiffs, the substance of which is stated in the answer of defendants; certain correspondence passing between the board of health and representatives of the plaintiffs; the minutes of the plaintiffs' board of control; and testimony as to what took place at a meeting of the board of health, and as to the action taken by the board. An injunction was refused, and the plaintiffs excepted, not only to the order refusing an injunction, but also to the overruling of objections made by them to the evidence as above set forth, which last ground, in view of the ruling made in the case, need not be considered. The assignment of error as to the refusal of an injunction is that it was against the equity of the case, and was in violation of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, in that it deprived the plaintiffs of their property without due process of law, and that under the facts and law of the case the court had no discretion except to grant the injunction as prayed.

No detailed statement of the evidence contained in the record is deemed to be necessary, but reference to such parts of it as becomes material will be considered in the discussion of the legal propositions by which the case is controlled. We shall undertake to establish two propositions as being sound in law, and controlling in this case. The first is that neither the municipal authorities of any city in this state nor any department of a city government has the legal right summarily to abate a nuisance, without first having given reasonable notice to the person maintaining the thing or doing the acts alleged to be a nuisance of the time and place of hearing the question whether such thing or the doing of such acts constitute a nuisance, and the determination by such body that the thing so maintained or the acts done in law constitute a nuisance, and this rule of law applies to all acts and things alleged to be nuisances except those which are by the law expressly declared to be nuisances, or which are indisputably so per se; and that this is true notwithstanding the municipal authorities, or any department thereof, have, by the charter of the town or city, been given the power to abate nuisances in such city. The second proposition is that under the law in force in this state jurisdiction to abate nuisances existing in a city of 20,000 population or more, except the specific acts done or thing maintained are declared by the common or statute law to be a nuisance, or which are indisputably so per se, resides in the police court of such city. We are aware that in entering the domain of the discussion necessary to support the proposition first above stated we will encounter seemingly contrary rulings in many adjudicated cases, and in treatises by learned text writers. On the other hand, the principles there announced are, we think, supported by reason, and due regard to the right of protection to the property of the citizen, favored by all courts, and the distinct current of the general authorities, and are recognized by our statutes. We eliminate entirely from the discussion reference to the rights of a private person to abate a public or private nuisance by his own act, for the reason that the principles of law which establish his right and fix his responsibility in so doing are not involved in this case, because when, according to the admitted fact, certain members of the board of health of the city of Atlanta undertook to remove the floor of the Union passenger station on the ground that it was a public nuisance maintained by the lessees thereof, which menaced the health of the city, this undertaking was for and in behalf of a recognized governmental department of the city, and the principle involved does not turn upon the question whether those members of the board of health who instituted such proceedings had or had not legal authority from the board so to do. It is sufficient for the purposes of this discussion that they assumed to do what was done in the name of that body. Nor do we think that the fact that the Union passenger station was the property of the state of Georgia, which had been leased to one of the plaintiffs, would prevent the lawful abatement of a nuisance existing in such station building and maintained by the lessees. Reference was made in the argument to the legal principle that the state is not included in the operation of a general law unless included eo nomine. The proposition is sound, but not applicable to the facts of this case. Assuming that the floor of the building which was sought to be removed as a nuisance was the property of the state, it is uncontested that such removal was attempted to be had for the purpose of replacing the plank floor with a permanent, and more costly one, at the expense of the lessees; and, had this purpose been accomplished, no loss or deprivation of property would have been occasioned to the state. With these suggestions as a passing reply to the point made, we proceed to the discussion of the first proposition stated above.

By an act of the general assembly, approved February 28, 1874 (Acts 1874, p. 116), a new charter was established for the city of Atlanta, in which, by § 67, the mayor and general council of the city were authorized to constitute one proper and fit person from each ward as a board of health, and it was made the duty of said board to report to the mayor and general council all nuisances which were likely to endanger the health of any portion of the city, and the mayor and general council were given power, upon the report of the board of health, to cause such nuisances to be abated, and its recommendations were to be carried out in a summary manner at the expense of the party causing the nuisance, etc. By § 71 it is provided that the board of health of the city of Atlanta may exercise the same power as is now vested in the mayor and general council of said city relating to the abatement of such nuisances as are likely to endanger the health of the city to such extent and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the mayor and said general council. Perhaps, by the original and amended charter of the city, further plenary powers in this respect were conferred, and we will assume, for the sake of the argument, that the board of health was invested both by the charter and municipal ordinances with the power to inquire into, and, concurrently with the mayor and general council, to abate, nuisances. It may also here be noticed that the manner of such abatement was to be summary, and by the officers of the police department of the city, under proper order. It must not be understood, however, that the use of the term "summary" means or implies that it shall or may be done without proper investigation of the facts, or that it may be done without notice, or an opportunity to be heard by the person who, it is alleged, committed the acts, or whose property is sought to be affected. A summary proceeding is thus defined by Mr. Bouvier: "A form of trial in which the ancient, established course of legal proceedings is disregarded, especially in the matter of trial by jury," etc. And this eminent lexicographer, citing Blackstone and Chancellor Kent, together with a number of adjudicated cases, says, referring to such a proceeding, that in no case can a party be tried summarily unless such proceedings are authorized by legislative authority, except, perhaps, in cases of contempt; for the common law is a stranger to such a mode of trial. Mr. Black defines a summary proceeding to be "any proceeding by which a controversy is settled, case disposed of, or trial conducted in a prompt, simple manner without the aid of a jury. . . . Proceedings are said to be summary when they are short and simple in comparison with regular proceedings; that is, with the proceedings which alone would have been applicable either in the same or analogous cases if summary proceedings had not been available." So, then, the power given to abate nuisances in a summary manner does not at all mean that they may be abated without notice or hearing, but simply that it may be done without a trial in the ordinary forms prescribed by law for a regular judicial procedure; and the abatement of a nuisance by the municipal authorities, after investigation and determination that a nuisance exists, on their order, by a police officer, is a summary proceeding. Indeed, it seems to be contemplated by the definitions referred to that a summary proceeding involves some kind of a trial; so that, when the board of health was invested with power to abate nuisances in a summary manner, they were not necessarily invested with the power to do so in the absence of any trial or inquiry into the facts without notice. The weight of authority and our own statute is to the effect that, as to nuisances of the character which the board of health alleges the floor of the passenger station to have been, it cannot lawfully be done without notice, and a judgment of the tribunal or department invested with power to abate. In the case 34 L. R. A.

of Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984, the Supreme Court of the United States ruled two propositions: First, that the question of nuisances or obstructions must be determined by general and fixed law; second, that it is not to be tolerated that the local municipal authorities of a city declare any particular business or structure a nuisance in such a summary mode (referring to the case), and enforce the decision at their own pleasure. In the case under consideration in that court it appeared that the legislature of Wisconsin had authorized the common council of the city of Milwaukee by ordinance to establish dock and wharf lines along certain rivers, to restrain and prevent encroachments upon said rivers and obstructions thereto; and the city, by an ordinance, had declared a particular wharf to be an obstruction to navigation, and a nuisance, and ordered it to be abated. An injunction was applied for to enjoin the city from interfering with the wharf ordered to be abated. In the course of his opinion in that case Mr. Justice Miller says: "The mere declaration by the city council of Milwaukee that a certain structure was an encroachment or obstruction did not make it so, nor could such declaration make it a nuisance unless it in fact had that character. It is a doctrine not to be tolerated in this country that a municipal corporation, without any general laws either of the city or of the state, within which a given structure can be shown to be a nuisance, can, by its mere declaration that it is one, subject it to removal by any person supposed to be aggrieved, or even by the city itself. This would place every house, every business, and all the property of the city, at the uncontrolled will of the temporary local authorities." In the case of Hutton v. Camden, 39 N. J. L. 122, 23 Am. Rep. 203, it appears from the report that by the charter of the city of Camden the common council was authorized to establish a board of health, and to define its powers and duties. That such council was authorized in its charter "to abate or remove nuisances of every kind at the expense of those maintaining the same, and to compel the owner or occupant of any lot, house, building, shed, cellar, or place wherein may be carried on any business or calling, or in or upon which there may exist any matter or thing which is or may be detrimental in the opinion of the sanitary committee or board of health, . . . to the health of the inhabitants of the city, . . . to . . . abate the same . . . under the direction of the city council," etc. Under this power the council passed an ordinance establishing a board of health, and provided that, whenever the board of health should deem it advisable for the public health of the city forthwith to abate or remove any nuisance in the city, it was authorized and directed to cause the same to be abated at the expense of the owner. It further appeared that at a meeting of the board of health on a particular day a resolution was passed that a lot of a citizen on a certain street be declared to be a nuisance, and the owner was directed to fill it up to grade. The order not being complied with, the city did the work at considerable cost, and, the owner refusing to pay it, an action was instituted to recover it. Referring to this declaration of the board of health that the lot was a nuisance, Chief Justice Beasley said: "Giving, therefore, to this resolution the utmost legal effect that can be ascribed to it, by conceding to the sanitary board a judicial capacity in the premises, still its action must be regarded as entirely void, inasmuch as it appears that it had not acquired jurisdiction over the plaintiffs in error. The proceeding was coram non judice, and as such was not merely voidable, but was an absolute nullity." Judge Dillon, in his great work on Municipal Corporations, in referring to nuisances, and to the power to prevent and abate them, says: "It is to secure and promote the public health, safety, and convenience that municipal corporations are so generally and so liberally endowed with power to prevent and abate nuisances. This authority, and its summary exercise, may be constitutionally conferred on the incorporated place, and it authorizes its council to act against that which comes within the legal notion of a nuisance; but such power, conferred in general terms, cannot be taken to authorize the extrajudicial condemnation and destruction of that as a nuisance which, in its nature, situation, or use, is not such." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 374. Mr. Wood, in his treatise on the law of Nuisances (vol. 2, § 744, p. 977), says: "A municipal corporation which is empowered to declare what shall be nuisances is not thereby authorized to declare that to be a nuisance which is not so in fact. Things which may or may not be nuisances, where their character in this respect depends upon circumstances, cannot be so declared in advance. The question when the thing may or may not be a nuisance must be settled as one of fact, and not of law." "To determine what is by the law a nuisance is an exercise of judicial power." State v. Noyes, 30 N. H. 204. In the case of Denver v. Mullen, 7 Colo. 345, 3 Pac. 693, it was ruled that things which were not nuisances per se must lawfully be ascertained to be such, and the municipal authorities could not arbitrarily declare a thing a nuisance, or destroy valuable property which is lawfully erected or created, without such lawful ascertainment; and except in exceptional cases, or where the thing is clearly a nuisance itself, it should be judicially determined. In Darst v. People, 51 Ill. 286, 2 Am. Rep. 301, it was ruled that intoxicating liquors could not be taken away or removed, under an ordinance declaring such liquors kept within the town limits to be a nuisance, before it had been judicially declared that the ordinance had been violated. But, as conclusive of the question, so far as this state is concerned, we have only to refer to a provision of our law which has been in force since 1833, and which is found in Civil Code, §§ 4760-4763. The first of these sections provides that a nuisance may be abated by the order of two or more justices of the peace in the county where it exists, founded upon the opinion of a jury, and the order shall be executed by the sheriff of the county, or his deputy. A further provision declares that, if the nuisance complained of exists in a town or city under the government of a mayor, etc., such nuisance may be abated, with the advice of the aldermen or council, by order of the mayor; and, referring to this provision, § 4763 expressly declares that reasonable notice shall be given to the parties interested of the time and place of the meeting of such justices and freeholders, or such mayor, intendant, aldermen, etc. These provisions constitute a general law of this state. It is, however, claimed that the charter of the city of Atlanta was enacted subsequently to the passage of the act which contains these provisions, and, that being so, the provisions of the charter have the legal effect of rendering inapplicable the provisions of the statute to the city of Atlanta; and the case of Montezuma v. Minor, 70 Ga. 191, is relied on for the proposition that the special authority granted to the board of health by the charter of Atlanta was not affected by prior or subsequent general laws. Without conceding that the case referred to is authority for the proposition that the charter of Atlanta was not affected by a subsequent law,—which proposition will be discussed in another part of this opinion,—we must, in fairness, accept the ruling made in that case as sustaining the proposition that a prior general law providing for the abatement of nuisances does not prevent the legislature from subsequently conferring such power on the municipal authorities of a city. In that case, as we understand the facts, the authorities of the town of Montezuma sought to abate as a nuisance a mill pond from which was operated a grist mill. To this attempt the defense was interposed by the owner that, if it was a nuisance, the same could not be abated by the authorities of the town, because under the act of 1833, referred to above, the ordinary of the county alone had jurisdiction, and that the affidavit of two or more freeholders was a condition precedent to the right of the ordinary to summon a jury and adjudge whether the mill and adjacent water were in fact a nuisance. This court ruled that, the act incorporating the town of Montezuma, being subsequent to the act of 1833, by its terms devested the jurisdiction of the ordinary, and vested the power to abate nuisances within its limits in the authorities of the town; and that under the charter of the town the municipal authorities had full power to abate a nuisance on the report of the board of health, although such nuisance consisted of a mill and machinery run by water. But how does the ruling there made affect the validity of the act of 1833 as to the requirement of notice to the parties interested of the time and place of the meeting of the mayor and council, at which the question of the existence of the nuisance is to be determined? The only change in this general law which the Minor Case, 70 Ga. 191, effected was that the ordinary was deprived of the jurisdiction which the general law conferred on that officer within the limits of the town of Montezuma. It only effected a substitution of one governmental agency for another, leaving the act of 1833 otherwise of full force and effect, and especially that part of it which declares that reasonable notice shall be given to the parties interested of the time and place of meeting of the mayor and aldermen. No change in this provision was caused by the act incorporating the town of Montezuma, and no change was effected in this provision, as we think, by the act creating a new charter for the city of Atlanta. It was a summary proceeding to abate a nuisance when done by the ordinary and a jury. It is none the less a summary proceeding when, after notice, the nuisance is ordered to be abated by the mayor or board of health.

Another proposition is relied on by the defendant in error to sustain its theory of the law of the case, to wit, that, where a duty is imposed, or a discretion vested, in a person or body, the exercise of this discretion is final. The proposition, as stated, is undoubtedly sound; but, while it is so, it is fundamental law that the performance of the duty, and the exercise of the discretion, in a case where personal liberty or private rights are involved, cannot legally be had in the absence of a notice to the person interested, that he may have an opportunity to contest the facts in relation to which such person or body is to exercise its discretionary power. The case of Americus v. Mitchell, 79 Ga. 807, 5 S. E. 201, is not at all in conflict with the proposition which we are endeavoring to sustain. In that case it appears that the municipal authorities were seeking to abate as a nuisance a mill pond within the limits of the city, and by the answer it appears that there was a judgment of the mayor and aldermen condemning the pond as a nuisance. A bill was filed seeking to enjoin the authorities from proceeding to destroy the dam which collected the water in the pond, on the ground that it was not a nuisance; and this court ruled that, under the charter and ordinances of the city, the mayor and council, on the recommendation of the board of health, had full power, in a summary manner, to abate nuisances, and that it was for that body to determine whether it was a nuisance or not. If they came to the conclusion that it was, they had the right to abate it in a summary manner. No point was made by the owner of the mill that he had no notice of the proceedings which were had under which his property was declared to be a nuisance. It is evident, however, that such proceedings were had from the fact that there was a judgment of condemnation by the mayor and aldermen. The only complaint was that this judgment was wrong. The effect of the ruling made is that a court of equity will not interpose to enjoin the execution of the judgment rendered on the ground that the finding was wrong. This case does not, in our judgment, construe the section of our Code requiring notice to the persons interested differently from the view which we now take of it. In Dunbar v. Augusta, 90 Ga. 390, 17 S. E. 907, cited by counsel for defendant in error, Chief Justice Bleckley said, in his opinion rendered in the case, that it was evident that the board of health did in fact consider and decide that the corn was dangerous to the public health, and that the chief, if not the only, reason suggested against the binding force of that decision is that it was made without notice to the owners of the property. As meeting this point fully and entirely, this eminent jurist said: "But, according to the authorities, notice was not essential except for the purpose of rendering the decision conclusive; the nuisance in question, if one at all, being a nuisance at common law." We are not contending that where the particular thing or the act sought to be abated is made a nuisance by statute, or is characterized as such by the common law, any inquiry or notice is necessary, because the question as to whether it is in fact a nuisance is already determined; but when the act or thing is not made so by the common or statute law,—as in this case,—the question whether it is or is not a nuisance is a judicial one, to be passed upon by the tribunal having power to abate it, after notice to the party interested. The case of Savannah v. Mulligan, 95 Ga. 323, 29 L. R. A. 303, 22 S. E. 621, is cited on this point by the defendant in error in support of its contention, but the ruling made in that case, we think does not require a different construction of the statute providing for notice than the one we have given to it. In that case Mulligan instituted an action against the city to recover the value of a feather bed, pillows, and a mattress destroyed by a sanitary inspector under orders of its health officer. This court ruled there that, unless the property destroyed was itself a nuisance endangering the public health or safety, it was wrongfully destroyed; but that if it did so endanger the public health, it might be destroyed by the authorities lawfully, and without paying the owner its value, if the charter of the city conferred on it the power to abate such nuisances. The decision referred to the provisions incorporated in § 1456 of the Political Code, as follows: "Analogous to the right of eminent domain is the power from necessity vested in corporate authorities of cities, towns, and counties to interfere with, and sometimes to destroy, the private property of the citizen for the public good, such as the destruction of houses to prevent the extension of a conflagration, or the taking possession of buildings to prevent the spreading of contagious diseases." By the facts of the case it was shown conclusively, said Chief Justice Simmons, who delivered the opinion, "and beyond question, that the property destroyed was in fact a nuisance endangering the public health, having been used as bedding by a person who had scarlet fever, a highly contagious disease; and the mayor and aldermen of the city, under its charter, had ample authority to abate the nuisance" in question. It may be well to consider at this point for a moment the power of municipal authorities to abate certain nuisances without any proceedings whatever except to order their abatement. These are, we think, not only such things as are by the law declared to be nuisances, but also those which are indisputably so per se. In each of these cases, a necessity exists to destroy private property in order to protect the public. Vicious animals, which are accustomed to attack a man, are nuisances, and under certain circumstances may be killed without any proceedings whatever, either by a private person or by order of the municipal authorities. It is a public nuisance for one who is infected with an infectious or contagious disease to expose himself in a public place. To take a horse infected with glanders into a public place is such. Mr. Tiedeman, in his work on Municipal Corporations, § 120, citing Ferguson v. Selma, 43 Ala. 398; Nolan v. Franklin, 4 Yerg. 163; North Chicago City R. Co. v. Lake View, 105 Ill. 207, 44 Am. Rep. 788; Hart v. Albany, 9 Wend. 571, 24 Am. Dec. 165,—declares that, where the property or act is per se a nuisance, the power of the municipality is unquestioned, though its exercise may involve the destruction of private property. In his work on Limitations of Police Power (§ 122g) the same author declares that in certain cases of extreme necessity the private individual may, without the aid of the government, abate or remove the nuisance (referring to a public nuisance); in other cases the government, through its proper department, must interfere. In the Mulligan Case, 96 Ga. 323, 29 L. R. A. 303, 22 S. E. 621, the property destroyed was a nuisance per se, which threatened the health of the people generally. Being a nuisance per se, there was no necessity for any inquiry; hence no need of notice. The further cited case of Morris v. Columbus, 102 Ga. 792, 42 L. R. A. 175, 30 S. E. 850, has, we think, but little application to the point now under discussion. Morris questioned the constitutionality of the act of the general assembly which had conferred upon the city of Columbus authority to require vaccination, and the court simply ruled that, in the exercise of the police power, the general assembly may confer upon the authorities of the city power to make and enforce an ordinance requiring all persons within the limits of the corporation to submit to vaccination, whenever an epidemic of smallpox is existing or may be reasonably apprehended. The only question of fact which could arise in that case was whether the occasion for the enactment of such an ordinance had arisen. And on an entirely different principle from any which we have invoked the municipal government must, of course, be the final and conclusive arbiter as to the existence of such conditions. It is our opinion that the provisions of our Code require, when a municipal corporation is seeking to abate a nuisance, such as it was alleged the 54 L. R. A.

floor of the Union passenger station was in this case, that the parties interested be given reasonable notice of the time and place of hearing at which the fact whether the property complained of is or is not a nuisance shall be inquired into and determined; that without such notice, and a judgment on the facts by the body invested with power to abate the nuisance, it is unlawful to enter thereon, and remove or destroy it as a nuisance. If the thing, as we have said, is declared by law to be a nuisance, or if it is unquestionably a nuisance,—such as a rabid dog, infected clothing, the carcass of a dead animal on a private lot, the presence of a smallpox patient on the street,—it may be abated by the municipal authorities at once, by order, from the necessity of the case, and to meet an emergency which exists to at once protect the health and lives of the people.

2. We now proceed to the consideration of the second question presented, namely, upon what department of the municipal government, under the laws of this state, devolves jurisdiction to abate nuisances in a city having a population of 20,000 or more? The provisions of the act of 1833, which are incorporated in § 4760 of the Civil Code, declare that any nuisance which tends to the immediate annoyance of the citizens in general, is manifestly injurious to the public health and safety, or tends to corrupt the manners and morals of the people, may be abated, etc. And it is only such nuisances as these that the act of 1833 refers to when, as codified in § 4762, it declares they may be abated by order of the mayor or aldermen when they exist in incorporated towns. It will be noted that a nuisance injurious to the public health is expressly brought within its provisions, and that to this class of nuisances the entire act refers, including, as we have previously shown, a requirement that reasonable notice shall be given to interested parties of the meeting of the mayor and aldermen to pass on the same before the order is issued. This act of 1833 is a public law, but, as seen in the Minor Case, 70 Ga. 191, it was ruled by this court that, notwithstanding it was a public law in force in 1871, the provisions in the charter of the town of Montezuma, passed by the legislature in that year, rendered inapplicable as to the abatement of nuisances in that town so much of the act as provided that, where the nuisance complained of was a grist mill, it should be abated by the ordinary and a jury of the county. Practically, this is the effect of the ruling made in that case. Other than to the town of Montezuma, and other towns and cities in which its operation has been specially suspended by charter provisions, this act remains in full force. By an act approved December 4, 1889, the general assembly amended the charter of the city of Atlanta, and, among other particulars, the caption of the act recites that it is "to confer upon the recorder's or mayor's court of said city the jurisdiction now devolving upon the mayor and general council in the trial and abatement of certain nuisances as provided by the law of the state as contained in "certain sections of the Code of Georgia." The amending act declares "that the jurisdiction now vested in the mayor and general council of said city under and by the laws of this state as contained in the Code of . . . 1882 in §§ 4094 to 4100, inclusive, in respect to the trial and abatement of nuisances, as set forth in said Code and sections, be, and the same is hereby, devolved upon and vested in the recorder's or mayor's court of said city. "Said recorder's or mayor's court shall have the same jurisdiction, power, and duty as to the trial and abatement of said nuisances as the mayor and general council of said city has heretofore had, and said mayor and general council are hereby relieved of jurisdiction and duty to try, hear, or abate such nuisances, provided and except that nothing in this act contained shall divest the mayor and general council and board of health of said city of jurisdiction as to nuisances affecting health, as now provided by law." So that this act, by its terms, conferred upon the recorder's or mayor's court of the city of Atlanta all the jurisdiction as to the trial and abatement of nuisances contained in the act of 1833 in respect thereto, and those which were conferred on the authorities of the city of Atlanta by its charter. except jurisdiction as to nuisances affecting health. It will here be noted that this enactment was subsequent to the adoption of our present Constitution, which declares that "no special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law." The act of 1833 was, as we have seen, a general law. The act of 1889 amending the charter of the city of Atlanta was a special law. The general act provided that nuisances in a town or city should be abated by the mayor and aldermen, etc. The special act conferred jurisdiction to abate such nuisances (or a class of them) in the recorder's or mayor's court. The special act recognized as applicable to the city of Atlanta the provisions of the act of 1833. Now, admitting, under the authority of the Minor Case, 70 Ga. 191, that prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1877 the general assembly could, by the terms of a special act, vary the terms of a general law as to the abatement of nuisances in a particular city, it is difficult to perceive how, under the provisions of the Constitution, the terms of a general law could be thus varied in 1889. As illustrating the serious import of that question, attention is called to the case of Connor v. Hall, 89 Ga. 257, 15 S. E. 308. After the passage of this amendment to the charter in 1889, Hall filed a petition in the recorder's court asking for an order to abate an alleged nuisance (a fence across an alley). This application was resisted, and a plea to the jurisdiction of the recorder was filed. After an adjudication that the nuisance existed, and an order by the recorder that it be abated, the defendant sued out a certiorari to the superior court, alleging that the judgment was contrary to the law and the evidence. The certiorari was overruled, that judgment was excepted to, and the case brought here. This court, after ruling on a point not material to be considered in this connection, ruled that, as no question as to the jurisdiction of the recorder was raised, it was not apparent that the judge of the superior court erred in affirming the judgment of the recorder. Subsequently the defendant in that judgment filed an application to enjoin its enforcement on the ground that the recorder had no jurisdiction to try the same, and that the judgment rendered by him was void. The allegation of a want of jurisdiction in the recorder rested on the unconstitutionality of this act of 1889, because it was in conflict with the provision of the Constitution to which we have just referred, and thereupon the plaintiff proposed to show that the erection of the fence was not a nuisance. The trial judge rejected this evidence, and ruled that the question of jurisdiction was settled by the former judgment, which was conclusive of every question that was or might have been made, and denied the application. In ruling upon the correctness of that judgment this court said that, when it appeared that a person was cited before the recorder's court to show cause why he should not abate a nuisance; that he appeared, and among other defenses pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court; that the plea was overruled, and the case tried upon its merits, and he was ordered to remove the nuisance, and thereupon took the case to the superior court by certiorari, and did not assign error upon the judgment overruling the plea to the jurisdiction,—there was no error in refusing to grant such person an injunction to prevent the city marshal from enforcing the judgment by removing the nuisance. Connor v. Hall, 91 Ga. 62, 16 S. E. 266. It would thus seem that the constitutionality of this amendment to the charter of Atlanta was at least doubted. Subsequently to these decisions (the latter having been rendered October 31, 1892) the general assembly passed a bill which was approved December 12, 1892, to amend the provision of the Code which, as part of the act of 1833, declared that, if the nuisance existed in a town or city, it might be abated and removed by order of the mayor, etc. This amendment was proposed in a bill introduced by Mr. King, one of the then representatives of the county of Fulton. Journal House Rep. 1892, p. 61, and which afterwards became a general law, was in the following words: "But if the nuisance complained of exists in a city having twenty thousand population or more the police court of such city, whether known as mayor's or recorder's court, or otherwise designated, shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the question of the existence of such nuisance, and if found to exist, to order its abatement, which order shall be directed to and executed by the sheriff or marshal of said town or city or their deputy." This act contained the usual clause repealing all laws and parts of laws in conflict therewith. So that the general law of 1833, which provided that nuisances in a city might be abated by the mayor and aldermen, was thus amended by the act of 1892, so that, if the nuisance existed in a city having a minimum population of 20,000, the jurisdiction to abate the nuisance should be exercised by the police court of that city; and not only so, but the officer presiding in that court should hear and determine the question of its existence before ordering its abatement. And it appears that such change was at the instance of the city of Atlanta through one of its worthy and able representatives. No other conclusion can be drawn from this enactment than that all the power conferred on the city of Atlanta (including its board of health) to abate a nuisance manifestly injurious to the public health was taken away thereby, and jurisdiction thereof vested in the mayor's or recorder's court for hearing and determining the question whether such nuisance exists. It must be understood, however, that in so ruling those things which are declared either by the common or statute law to be nuisances, or which are nuisances per se, and from their very nature are indisputably so, are not included either in the ruling or in what has been said in the way of argument. As we have endeavored to show in the first division of this opinion, as to them no inquiry is necessary, because they have been so pronounced, or their character as such cannot be denied. In opposition to the view which we have just taken of the nature of the act of 1892, it is claimed that that act does not operate as a repeal of the provisions of the charter of the city of Atlanta as to the abatement of nuisances, and it is urged that repeals by implication are not favored. We assent to the correctness of the latter proposition, but, while not favored, the repeal of a special statute or particular parts thereof results by operation of law under certain well-defined rules. If this act repeals the charter provisions of the city of Atlanta, such repeal is by implication; and just here it may be observed that the test whether such repeal has been effected is whether it was the intention of the general assembly that such should be its effect. Concerning the repeal by implication of a general law by the enactment of another general law, Mr. Sedgwick, in his work on the Construction of Statutory and Constitutional Law, 2d ed. p. 104, says: "It is equally well settled that a subsequent statute, which is clearly repugnant to a prior one, necessarily repeals the former, although it does not do so in terms; and, even if the subsequent statute be not repugnant in all its provisions to a prior one, yet, if the latter statute was clearly intended to prescribe the only rule that should govern in the case provided for, it repeals the original act." Mr. Sutherland, in his work on Statutory Construction (p. 179), says, on the same subject: "An implied repeal results from some enactment the terms and necessary operation of which cannot be harmonized with the terms and necessary effect of an early act." To the same effect, see also Potter's Dwarrr. Stat. 54 L. R. A.

p. 154, and Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, p. 280, with which rule the decisions of this court are in harmony. Girardey v. Dougherty, 18 Ga. 262; Erwin v. Moore, 15 Ga. 361; Johnson v. Southern Mut. Bldg. & L. Asso. 97 Ga. 622, 25 S. E. 358. The exact question, however, is whether the repeal of a special act is necessarily effected by the enactment of a general law covering the same subject; and it must be conceded that, as a rule, this effect is brought about less readily than where both the repealed and repealing statutes are in the form of general laws. Nevertheless, it rests upon the intention of the lawmakers, and we apprehend that the rule is that, when a general law is enacted, making certain provisions in relation to all the towns of this state, and the provisions of the enactment clearly manifest that it was the purpose of the lawmakers to establish a given condition in all of such municipalities, that the terms of such general law will supersede the rights and powers given to any particular municipality by its charter. Citing a number of authorities for the proposition, Judge Dillon in 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 85, says: "The powers conferred upon municipal corporations may at any time be altered or repealed by the legislature, either by a general law operating upon the whole state, or, in the absence of constitutional restriction, by a special act." Also, upon the authority of a number of later cases for his text, Mr. Tiedeman, in his treatise on the law of Municipal Corporations (§ 32), declares: "The powers and privileges conferred upon a municipal corporation by act of the legislature may at any time be repealed or amended by the legislature, either by a general law applicable to all municipal corporations throughout the state, or, in absence of constitutional limitations, by a special act applying to the particular corporation." It was ruled by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in the case of Nusser v. Com. 25 Pa. 126, that a general act prescribing the mode of punishment of a specific offense throughout the state operates to repeal an act limited to a single county prescribing the mode of punishment for the same offense within the designated county. To the same effect, see State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Percy, 44 Mo. 159, in which case the repeal seems to have been based on the proposition that by the enactment of a general law it was the manifest purpose of the legislature to produce uniformity. A number of authorities are cited in note 1, p. 214, by Mr. Sutherland (in his work above cited), to support what he declares to be the doctrine in such cases, which the text states as follows: "There is no rule of law which prohibits the repeal of a special act by a general one, nor is there any principle forbidding such repeal without the use of words declarative of that intent. The question is always one of intention, and the purpose to abrogate the particular enactment by a later general statute is sufficiently manifested when the provisions of both cannot stand together." [§ 159, p. 213.] In the case of Pausch v. Guerrard, 67 Ga. 319, this court seems to have recognized the rule above announced as law in this state when it ruled that "while, ordinarily, a general law does not repeal a prior local law, unless the latter be specially named or necessarily embraced in the terms used, yet where it is apparent from the act itself and the Constitution of the state that it was intended to embrace the local law, the latter will be held to be modified or repealed thereby." But, as being conclusive, on principle, of the question under consideration, the case of Croratt v. Mason, 101 Ga. 246, 28 S. E. 891, is directly in point. A general act of this state provides that after its passage aldermen of towns and cities of this state, except in towns and cities of less than 2,000 inhabitants, shall be incompetent to hold any other municipal office during the term for which they are chosen. In the case just cited the defendant in error resided in Brunswick. He was, in December, 1895, elected an alderman of that city for a term of two years. During his term he was elected mayor. His eligibility to this office was questioned, and he replied that under the terms of the charter of Brunswick, granted prior to the enactment of the general law, he was eligible to be elected mayor while holding the office of alderman. It was said in the opinion in that case that, as the act bears uniformly upon all towns and cities throughout the state which are included and come in the class concerning which the legislation is had, the law was a general one, and that the contention that a special act which declared what persons were eligible to the office of mayor of the city of Brunswick was not modified by the general act was unsound; that it was the legislative act which created the municipal corporation of Brunswick, and prescribed the manner in which the offices of the corporation should be filled. Having done so, it remained in the power of the legislature to change that method at will. And we know of no reason why this cannot be legitimately done by a general statute declaring and fixing the policy of the state in all cities and towns of a certain class. It is not possible that the terms of the general act of 1892 in relation to the abatement of nuisances in the city of Atlanta and the provision of the charter of the city of Atlanta in respect thereto can be construed so as to stand together. The charter confers the power to abate on the mayor and general council and the board of health. The general statute, before it was amended, conferred it on the mayor and aldermen, and there was little difference in the provisions of the general statute and the charter in this regard. The amendatory act of 1892 left the power to abate nuisances in the towns and cities of this state, where the general act of 1833 had placed it, except as to those cities which have a population of 20,000 or more, to which latter class Atlanta belongs; and as to these the power to abate nuisances is vested in the police court. The jurisdiction thus conferred must be exclusive, otherwise the general act would have to be construed as applying to some of the cities of the class named, and not to others. Being a general law, it must have general application to all cities coming within the class. That such was the intention of the lawmakers is manifest, not only because it was expressly made general by its terms, but in words it declares that all laws in conflict with its provisions are repealed. It must therefore be held, as a matter of law, that the power to abate nuisances of the kind in question is vested in the recorder's court of the city of Atlanta, and that at the time the board of health undertook to remove the floor of the Union passenger station in Atlanta because it was alleged to be a public nuisance it had no authority to do so; and, inasmuch as it is not only alleged, but shown, that the damages which would have been sustained by plaintiffs in error would have been irreparable in their nature if the removal of the floor was continued, the trespass thus being committed should have been enjoined, and the judgment refusing the application is reversed.

ATLANTA & WEST POINT RAILROAD

(113 Ga. 193.)

*Minority stockholders of a corporation, who, by filing an equitable petition against it and its officers, succeeded in enjoining it and them from doing ultra vires acts which would have required the expenditure of money belonging to it, were not entitled to a judgment for their attorney's fees against the corporation, when there was, as a result of the litigation, neither a recovery of property for the corporation, nor administration or distribution by the court of any fund brought into its hands for this purpose, and when the corporation itself repudiated the effort of the plaintiffs to thus protect its interests, and, in defense to their petition, stood squarely upon the proposition that the acts in question were not ultra vires, but authorized by its charter.

(April 24, 1901.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Fulton County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover attorney's fees alleged to have been expended in preventing illegal action on the part of defendants. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

*Headnote by FISH, J.

NOTE.—As to allowing attorney's fees out of corporate funds to minority stockholders who have successfully maintained a suit to recover corporate property wrongfully conveyed by the corporate officers, see, in this series, Grant v. Lookout Mountain Co. (Tenn.) 27 L. R. A. 98.

Mr. Henry A. Alexander, for plaintiffs in error:

Trustees are entitled to be paid out of the trust property all expenses that are necessary for its security, protection, or preservation.

2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1085; Lewin, Tr. p. 557; Perry, Tr. § 910.

Officers of a corporation occupy a fiduciary relation, and, while not actual trustees, are trustees sub modo, and are governed by the same rules as actual trustees.

3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1088; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 237.

It is the essential and fundamental duty of the officers of a corporation to see that its operations are kept within the powers conferred by its charter. Whenever the officers undertake to embark the corporation on enterprises which are beyond the powers conferred upon it by charter, the legal effect of such action is the virtual abdication of their offices, and, as to such proceedings, they cease to represent the corporation. Stockholders who come forward at such a crisis and undertake to prevent the corporation from entering on such illegal course virtually become themselves, to that extent, clothed with the official character which the unfaithful officers have, by their misconduct, renounced, and become themselves the representatives of all the stockholders. The expenses incurred by them in such character should not be put upon them alone, but upon all ratably, and be paid by the corporation.

If power exists to do any of the acts complained of, then a majority of the stockholders and board of directors can exercise such power, and the minority have no right to complain. A court will not control the majority in the exercise of rightful power, even though it may differ as to the advisability of such exercise.

If the general railroad law, so far as it would materially amend the charter, is not binding on the dissentients, the charter being amendable, the act of amendment is not void as would be an amendment in the case of an irrevocable charter, but is simply not binding upon dissentients, so far as material and fundamental, so long as they dissent. It is binding fully, so far as not a material and fundamental alteration.

Fish, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1898 the stockholders of the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, in annual meeting assembled, passed, by a majority vote of the stockholders of the company, a resolution that the company should at once apply to the secretary of state for an amendment to its charter granting to it all the powers and privileges contained in the general law of the state for the incorporation of railroad companies. An application in the name of the company for the amendment was then made to, and granted by, the secretary of state. The railroad company then undertook and began to construct just outside of the corporate limits of the city of Atlanta a belt railroad, about 6 miles long, extending from a point on its main line to a point on the Georgia railroad. The Central of Georgia Railway Company and certain other minority stockholders of the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company brought an equitable petition against the latter company and other defendants to prevent the construction of this belt line. The superior court refused to grant the injunction, and the plaintiffs brought the case to this court, where the judgment of the lower court was reversed solely upon the ground that the amendment sought to be made to the charter was void, because it was of such a vital and radical character that it could not be ingrafted thereon without the consent of all the stockholders of the company, 54 L. R. A.

and without the amendment the company had no power to construct this belt road. See Alexander v. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. 108 Ga. 151, 33 S. E. 866, where, in the opinion of the court, will be found a fuller statement of the case and the contentions of the parties thereto. After the judgment of this court had been made the judgment of the court below, and before a final decree in the case, the plaintiffs filed an amendment to their petition, in which they alleged that by their action in obtaining the injunction they had saved and preserved for the benefit of the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company a large amount of money which would otherwise have been dissipated, and had caused to be returned to the treasury of the company the money which had been illegally expended, and that the benefits of their action had accrued to the corporation and all of its stockholders, including those who were defendants, and that, as a matter of law and equity, the corporation was bound and should be compelled by a decree of the court, to pay all their costs and expenses, and all reasonable attorney's fees earned by their counsel. They prayed that the court would ascertain and determine the amount of said costs and expenses, and the reasonable attorney's fees earned in the cause, and that the defendant corporation be decreed to pay the same. The attorneys for the plaintiffs joined in the application in reference to the payment of the counsel fees, and prayed that the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company should be required, by the decree of the court, to pay to them reasonable attorney's fees for their services in the case, alleging that such services were reasonably worth the sum of $17,500. The amendment was demurred to, and the court sustained the demurrer and ordered the amendment to be stricken, to which ruling the plaintiffs excepted. The question for us to determine is whether or not the court erred in sustaining this demurrer.

As a general rule, only the court costs are chargeable to the losing party, and counsel fees and other expenses of litigation contracted for or incurred by the successful suitor cannot be included in the judgment. Every litigant must pay his own counsel. To this rule there are certain statutory exceptions, none of which are involved in this case. There are also cases where a fund has been brought into court for distribution, or property has been brought under the court's control, as the result of the litigation instituted and carried on by the plaintiff in behalf of himself and others, who have a common interest which is represented by him, in which the court will order that the necessary expenses of litigation and counsel fees which he has incurred shall be paid out of the fund which has been brought into court for distribution, or out of property which has been brought under the court's control, as the result of the plaintiff's diligence. So, a trustee, being the legal representative of those interested in the trust fund, is usually allowed out of the fund necessary and reasonable expenses, including counsel fees, incurred in the proper management, protection, and preservation of the fund. Plaintiffs in error have cited authorities which sustain this last proposition, but we fail to see the relevancy of the same in the present case. A corporation may be regarded as a trustee for all of its stockholders, and the directors have been considered as quasi trustees for the corporation and their fellow shareholders; but a stockholder, as such, is trustee for no one. In Hubbard v. Camperdown Mills, 25 S. C. 496, 1 S. E. 5, where the supreme court of South Carolina held that "the attorneys of a minority of the stockholders of an insolvent corporation, who have filed a bill for injunction, receiver, and sale, charging fraud and confederacy on the part of the defendants, are not entitled to have their fees allowed out of the proceeds of sale made by the receiver appointed under the bill," McIver, J., said: "It has been argued here that the plaintiffs 'were in law and in fact, trustees,' and that having, in that capacity, brought this action, their expenses in so doing, including the fees of their counsel, are properly chargeable on the assets of the corporation constituting the trust fund. We do not question the proposition that a trustee is entitled to reimbursement out of the trust fund for all expenses properly incurred in preserving or protecting that fund. But we are unable to understand how these plaintiffs can, in any sense, be regarded as trustees. They were simply stockholders in a corporation, holding only a minority of the stock; two of them being also creditors to comparatively small amount. Being in the minority, they could not control, and therefore would not be responsible for, the management of the affairs of the corporation. They certainly cannot be regarded as trustees for the other stockholders, and, as to the creditors, they simply stood in the relation of debtors to the extent of their interest in the corporation." In Hand v. Savannah & C. R. Co. 21 S. C. 162, where the question presented was, who were entitled to fees and costs out of a fund in court, Simpson, Ch. J., in the course of an able opinion, in which he explains at length the governing principle in such cases, says: "The underlying principle in all these cases, where one has been allowed compensation out of a common fund belonging to others, for expenses incurred and services rendered in behalf of the common interest, is the principle of representation or agency. Where such compensation has been allowed, the party claiming has been in some way the recognized and authoritative representative of the whole, and therefore authorized to contract for the whole." Again, he gives the true principle in the following words, which have been quoted, and the principle approved and followed, by the supreme court of South Carolina in several subsequent cases: "No one can legally claim compensation for voluntary services to another, however beneficial they may be, nor for incidental benefits and advantages to one, flowing to him on account of services rendered to another, by whom he may have been employed. Before legal charge can be sustained, there must be a contract of employment, either expressly made or superinduced by the law upon the facts." Thompson, in his valuable work on Corporations, vol. 5, § 7056, p. 5586, referring to the quotation last above given, which he had quoted in the preceding section of the work, says: "The true principle is that expounded by the supreme court of South Carolina in the quotation given in the preceding section and in other subsequent decisions,—that it is only where one party is, under the principles of equity, entitled to proceed for the benefit of all who stand in a like situation with him, and consequently where the counsel whom he employs stands, in a sense, as representing all, that counsel are entitled to have their fees paid out of the common fund which they have recovered for the benefit of all." We agree with the South Carolina court and the learned author in holding that this is the true principle which should be applied in such cases. In the case under consideration the plaintiffs have brought no fund into court for distribution, nor have they brought any property whatever under the control of the court. The court has nothing within its grasp to dispose of which furnishes it the opportunity and imposes upon it the duty of recognizing and giving effect to substantial equities and existing rights. There are no assets in its hands for administration and distribution. Though we have examined numerous cases, we have yet to find one where, in the absence of statutory provisions applicable to the facts of the case, it has been held that a court has the power to relieve one party, either in whole or in part, of the burden of paying his own counsel, putting that burden upon another, when no property has been brought under the control of the court, and no fund has been brought into court for distribution.

What is the equity that the plaintiffs set up, and upon which they rely? It is not that they have brought into court something to be administered and distributed, and that another standing in like situation as themselves should not avail himself of the fruits of their diligence without bearing his share of the necessary expenses which they have incurred; but they allege that, by the suit which they instituted and prosecuted to a successful termination, they have saved and preserved for the benefit of the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company a large amount of money, which, but for their efforts, would have been expended in the construction of the belt road, which the company had no legal power to build; and they have, by the same means, caused to be returned to the treasury of the company a considerable sum, which had already been invested in this illegal enterprise. They do not claim that the proceeding which they instituted and successfully prosecuted resulted in any order, judgment, or decree of the court which compelled the return to the corporation's treasury of any money which had been illegally diverted therefrom.

Granted that they have accomplished what they claim, and that by so doing they have really benefited the corporation; upon what theory can it be held that the court has the power to compel the railroad company to pay the expenses which they voluntarily, without its solicitation or authority, incurred in bringing about this result? Undoubtedly there are instances in which, owing to the wrongful and fraudulent conduct of those in control of the affairs of the corporation, stockholders may, in right of the corporation, bring an action to undo a wrong done to the corporation; and, if they are successful in restoring to the company money or property of which it has been wrongfully deprived, they may be entitled to have their attorney's fees and other necessary expenses of the litigation paid by the corporation for which they were acting. A stockholder may always sue when the right of action is directly in himself, and in doing so he simply exercises a right which every person who is sui juris has,—of applying for himself to the courts for the protection of his legal rights. He may sometimes sue when the right of action is in the corporation, and in doing so he merely represents the corporation, in whose behalf he is permitted to set the machinery of the court in motion. In cases of the first class, the stockholder, whether successful or not, must bear the necessary expenses which he incurs in the litigation, and cannot compel the corporation to defray them, or to compensate him if he has already paid them. In cases of the second class, if he succeeds in the suit, and the corporation receives and enjoys the fruits of his efforts in its behalf, the court can require the necessary expense of the litigation incurred by the plaintiff, including his attorney's fees, to be paid out of the property or fund recovered in the suit. It is important, therefore, to determine to which class of cases the action brought by the minority stockholders in the case under consideration belongs. Did the original case, as made by the plaintiffs, to the extent that it was sustained by the court, fall within the class in which the right to sue is in the corporation, or did it fall within the class where the right to sue is in the complaining stockholder? In 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1091, it is said: "Whenever the acts of the directors do not consist of any wrongful misuse of the corporate property, or wrongful exercise of the corporate franchise, but are of such a nature that they directly and primarily affect the interest of the stockholders in their shares of stock, by diminishing its value or otherwise impairing their proprietary rights in it, then the stockholders are directly injured and are primarily interested. As the cestuis que trust whose rights have been violated, they must institute and maintain any equitable suits for relief against their defaulting trustees. The remedy is for their benefit, and belongs to them alone. On the other hand, whenever the breach of trust consists of a wrongful dealing of any kind or in any manner with the corporate property or with the corporate franchises, the corporation itself is directly injured and is primarily interested. As the cestui que trust whose rights have been violated, it must institute and maintain any equitable suits for relief against its defaulting trustees. The remedy obtained, whether pecuniary or otherwise, is for its benefit, and belongs to it alone. Under certain special circumstances, in cases of this latter kind, where the suit should be brought by the corporation as plaintiff, but it becomes impossible to institute such a proceeding, in order to prevent a complete failure of justice the stockholders are permitted to set the machinery of the court in motion by commencing the action in their own names; but otherwise the suit is treated in every respect as one brought by and for the corporation. In applying these general propositions, it will be found that there are several distinct classes of cases appropriate for different conditions of fact, and governed by different rules." In the next section the learned author deals with one of these classes, which he designates as the "first class," and then, in § 1093, says: "In a second class of cases, where the directors are not charged with any misappropriation of the corporate property for their own benefit, nor with any breach of their fiduciary duty to the corporation, but, although purporting to act for the common welfare, they have adopted, or are about to adopt, some measure which is ultra vires, or beyond the scope of their corporate powers, a suit may be prosecuted against them by stockholders to obtain the appropriate relief, either of rescission or of prevention. . . . The theory of this class of suits is that a stockholder has a right that the operations of the corporation should be kept by the directors within the powers conferred by its charter. Every measure which transcends those powers, although done in good faith, violates the rights which inhere in the ownership of stock, and puts the value of the stock itself at hazard. The suit may be brought by a single stockholder suing on his own account alone, or by a stockholder suing on behalf of himself and all others who are similarly situated. The corporation is, of course, made a codefendant, and any other corporation or person who has joined in the ultra vires transaction may also be made a codefendant." The italics in these quotations are ours. On the same subject, 4 Thomp. Corp. § 4491, says: "Where an action is brought by one or more stockholders to enjoin the performance of ultra vires, fraudulent, or oppressive acts on the part of the directors, the remedy is preventive, consisting of an injunction against the performance of such acts, to which may be superadded, in appropriate cases, other forms of equitable relief. Where, on the other hand, the action is brought to undo frauds and breaches of trust already committed, and to restore to the corporation assets thereby wasted, the action does not, as in the former case, proceed in right of the stockholder, but it proceeds in right of the corporation; and consequently whatever is restored accrues to the corporation, and the law at once attaches to it the character of a trust fund, for the creditors of the corporation first, and for its stockholders next, in which all are to share ratably, and in respect of which no one gets a preference over the other,—not even the stockholder who takes upon himself the burden of prosecuting the suit which results in its restoration."

Under these authorities, into which class of cases does the suit brought by the minority stockholders in the present case fall? Were they suing in right of the corporation, or in right of themselves, as minority stockholders? What was the real gist of their action,—the ground upon which they were entitled to and obtained the relief for which they prayed? It is found in the 18th and 21st paragraphs of the petition as amended. These paragraphs set forth the real gravamen of their complaint,—the cause of action upon which the injunction was granted. The 18th paragraph alleges: "The petitioners in this case for valuable consideration, bought their stock in said Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, long prior to the 13th day of September, 1898, in view of its charter rights, and because of its contracts so made with the state of Georgia as to its franchises, and because these petitioners, by the fact of holding the obligations of said Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, were entitled to certain rights, and affected only by certain liabilities, growing out of and fixed in said charter of the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company." The 21st paragraph is as follows: "The said action of the stockholders and directors was illegal, in this; a majority of the stockholders of the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company had no right, as against said minority petitioners, to make any such change in its articles of incorporation, because it was a material and fundamental change in the contract between the state of Georgia and the corporation, and between the corporation and these petitioners. If of force, it was a material and essential alteration of said original contract, and does not in any way bind these minority petitioners, because it impairs the obligation of the contracts of said Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company with the state of Georgia and the said contracts of these petitioners with the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company by giving new powers and by creating new liabilities and new obligations not embraced under their original contract. This cannot be done under said general law, because it is a violation of the Constitution of the United States (art. 1, § 10), and of the Constitution of the state of Georgia (art. 1, § 3, ¶ 2), each of which constitutions, at said cited places in them, respectively, forbids the passage by the legislature of Georgia of 'any law impairing the obligation of contracts.'" The sole ground upon which the injunction was granted was that the building of the belt railroad by the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company would be an ultra vires act, which the plaintiffs, as dissenting stockholders, had the right to prevent. They had the right to stand upon the implied contract that the charter of the corporation would not be vitally and radically changed without their consent, and that the corporation would not engage in any enterprise not authorized by its charter. This they did, and appealed to the court to protect them against a violation of their rights, and it was for the protection of their rights that the court granted the injunction. Whatever they may have said in the original petition as to the injury which the corporation would suffer if its funds were used in the construction and operation of this belt line, reduced to its last analysis, the true merit in their case, upon which the court acted in granting the relief for which they prayed, was that the building of the belt line, not being within the powers granted to the corporation in its charter, would violate the rights which inhered in the ownership of their stock. It was because it would violate those rights that the court granted the injunction for which they prayed. Their suit was not for the corporation, but for themselves. They were not seeking to recover for the corporation any of its assets of which it had been wrongfully and fraudulently deprived, nor were they seeking to undo any wrong whatever which had been done to the corporation. The solid ground upon which they stood was that, without their consent, as stockholders, the amendment to the charter was a nullity, and without the amendment the building of the belt line would be a violation of their rights as stockholders in the corporation. The corporation did not authorize them to employ the attorneys who represented them; nor have they, through the court, recovered anything whatever for the corporation, from the acceptance of which by the corporation an obligation on its part to pay the necessary expenses of litigation incurred by them might be implied. There is therefore no ground upon which to found even a plausible presumption that in prosecuting the suit they were acting as agents of the corporation. Counsel for the plaintiffs in error cite, "as absolutely conclusive" in their favor, "the remarks of Mr. Pomeroy in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, in § 1095 of the third volume [second volume 2d ed.]," and quote extensively from this section of the author's valuable work. We think counsel have misunderstood the author's meaning. We have already shown, in the two sections which we have quoted from this work, that, according to this eminent authority, the right to sue in a case of this character is in the stockholder, and not in the corporation; and, rightly understood, there is nothing in the section quoted by counsel which conflicts with those which we have quoted. The learned author does not here contradict himself. In the section upon which counsel rely he says: "Wherever a cause of action exists primarily in behalf of the corporation against directors, officers, and others, for wrongful dealing with corporate property, or wrongful exercise of corporate franchises, so that the remedy should regularly be obtained through a suit by and in the name of the corporation, and the corporation either actually or virtually refuses to institute or prosecute such a suit, then, in order to prevent a failure of justice, an action may be brought and maintained by a stockholder or stockholders, either individually or suing on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, against the wrongdoing directors, officers, and other persons; but it is absolutely indispensable that the corporation itself should be joined as a party,—usually as a codefendant. The rationale of this rule should not be misapprehended. The stockholder does not bring such a suit because his rights have been directly violated, or because the cause of action is his, or because he is entitled to the relief sought. He is permitted to sue in this manner simply in order to set in motion the judicial machinery of the court." The italics here are the author's. "The rationale of this rule should not be misapprehended," as it seems to have been by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs in error. In the present case the stockholder does bring the suit because his rights have been directly violated. He does bring it because the cause of action is his. He does bring it because he is entitled to the relief sought. He is not merely "permitted to sue in this manner simply in order to set in motion the judicial machinery of the court" in behalf of the corporation, but he has a right to sue because his contract has been violated and his rights are imperiled. He is not compelled, as in the class of cases with which the author deals in the section of the work quoted by counsel, before bringing his suit, to ask the corporation to institute the suit, and, when bringing it, to allege such a request, and a denial of the same, or to furnish a reason why he did not make it. He stands upon his own rights, and not those of the corporation. He does not come into court as the agent of the corporation, nor is he overshadowed by it. He does not represent it, but represents himself. His position is this: "When I acquired the stock which I hold, I did it upon the faith of the then existing charter of the corporation, and this charter cannot be legally changed, in a vital and radical manner, without my consent. I have not consented for it to be so amended, and without the amendment the act which I seek to enjoin is beyond the power of the corporation. I stand upon my rights as a stockholder, based upon the contract which the law implies exists between the corporation, the other stockholders, and myself, and I ask the court to protect me against a violation of this contract." Coming into court upon such a proposition as this, he needs, as we have said, no permission to sue "simply in order to set in motion the judicial machinery of the court," for the protection of the corporation; for he comes in his own right and upon his own cause of action. He can stand alone if he chooses, or he can sue in behalf of himself and all other stockholders who are similarly situated, and who see fit to come in and join with him in the action;

but he cannot make those who neither authorize nor adopt his suit contribute to the payment of the necessary expenses which he has paid or incurred in its prosecution.

Counsel for the plaintiffs in error cite a number of cases in support of their contention. They say: "There was no fund in court in Meeker v. Winthrop Iron Co. 17 Fed. 48. When the expenses of litigation were allowed there, nothing had been done except the cancellation of a lease which had been adjudged to be unlawful. There was no property in court." We have read that case very carefully, and are of opinion that it fails to sustain the contention of plaintiffs in error. In that case the plaintiffs sued in right of the corporation, to undo a wrong done to it, and succeeded in having a fraudulent lease of its property canceled. The court appointed a receiver to take charge of and superintend the company's business, and required the defendants to account with the corporation for certain rents and profits; and, in the administration of the trust fund, the control of which it had thus acquired, the court decreed that the plaintiffs, having prosecuted the suit "for the common benefit of all the parties interested, to protect and preserve the trust fund, were entitled to be reimbursed therefrom for all proper expenditures made or liabilities incurred in and about the prosecution of the same." There may have been no property in court at the precise moment when the expenses of litigation were allowed to the plaintiffs, but the same decree which provided for the allowance of these expenses also provided for the appointment of the receiver. The court took charge of the company's business, canceled a fraudulent lease of its property, and decreed that the minority stockholders who had come to the rescue of the corporation, and brought its business and property under the jurisdiction and control of the court, should be reimbursed the necessary expenses which they had incurred in the suit which had brought about these results. Though, from the necessity of the case, the suit had to be instituted and carried on by the minority stockholders, it was clearly in the right of the corporation, and the recovery was for the corporation. Another case cited is Decatur Mineral Land Co. v. Palm, 113 Ala. 531, 21 So. 315. That case was clearly one in which the minority stockholders were suing to undo a wrong done to the corporation by certain directors thereof, who had neglected their duty to the corporation, and had appropriated "exorbitant and unreasonable amounts" of the company's funds in the payment of salaries to themselves. The opinion of the court clearly shows that it was a suit which the stockholders could not bring in their own right, but which could only be brought in right of the corporation; the corporation being the only proper complainant in such an action. Coleman, J., delivering the opinion, after stating the case, said: "It will be seen from this statement of the purposes of the bill that the corporation is the proper complainant, and that stockholders are not allowed to apply to a court of equity for relief in such a case, except upon averment and proof that the corporation has refused upon application to remedy the wrong, or upon sufficient averments to show that application to the board of directors or stockholders would have been in vain, or the circumstances were such as to excuse the complaining stockholders from first seeking a remedy in this way, if there can be any other in any case." It was upon this ground that the court reversed the judgment of the court below, which overruled a demurrer based thereon, and for this reason the court said: "Ordinarily, we would render a decree here annulling the decree of the court below, and dismissing complainants' bill; but we find difficulties, owing to the condition of the case as presented in the abstract, when submitted for final decree." It is true that the court did hold that, where minority stockholders, by suit, obtain a cancelation of claims against the corporation, and an injunction restraining the directors from voting excessive compensation to officers, the complainants are entitled to a reasonable solicitor's fee, to be paid by the corporation; but as the court held that the demurrer to the bill, for the reasons indicated above, should have been sustained, we do not see how the question with reference to the plaintiffs' attorney's fees was properly before it for determination. However that may be the suit, as the court decided, was one which could only stand in court in right of the corporation, and which the stockholders could not bring in their own behalf. Another case cited is Grant v. Lookout Mountain Co. 93 Tenn. 691, 27 L. R. A. 98, 28 S. W. 90, where the corporation was held liable for the reasonable attorney's fees of the plaintiffs, who were minority stockholders. There the suit, though brought by these stockholders, was, in the language of the court, "to all intents and purposes, the suit of the corporation itself," and the whole of its property, both real and personal, which had been illegally conveyed away, "threatening the entire destruction and dissolution of the corporation," was recovered and restored to the corporation. The court said it was a suit which the corporation ought to have commenced, that it was an indispensable party thereto, and that for this reason the decree was not recovered for the minority stockholders, but for the corporation. In the case of Fox v. Hale & N. Silver Min. Co. 108 Cal. 475, 41 Pac. 328, a single stockholder successfully prosecuted a suit to undo a wrong done to the corporation, and to recover from the wrongdoers a large amount of money of which the corporation had been deprived by means of a fraudulent conspiracy between the directors and others. The defendants took the main case up (108 Cal. 369, 41 Pac. 308), and the branch of the case which counsel cite went to the supreme court upon a separate appeal by the corporation "from that part of the judgment appointing a receiver of the moneys collected on the execution, and directing him to pay the plaintiff's attorneys, as compensation for their services, 25 per cent of all moneys so collected." After the appeal was taken, it was "voluntarily dismissed by the appellant, so far as the amount of the allowance to attorneys . . . [was] concerned," so that it stood "as an appeal from that part of the decree appointing a receiver, and involves only the question of the power of the court to make such appointment." Beatty, Ch. J., delivering the opinion, said: "There is no doubt, we think, that the case was one in which the court had power to appoint a receiver to carry its judgment into effect. The action was not prosecuted by the plaintiff in his own right or for his own exclusive benefit. He sued in behalf of the corporation to recover a fund in which others were equally interested, and the judgment in his favor was for the use and benefit of the corporation. He was, therefore, not entitled to receive the amount of the judgment himself, but clearly was entitled to an allowance out of the moneys collected of his reasonable expenses, including counsel fees." Manifestly, that case is in no way in conflict with the conclusion at which we have arrived in the one before us. Counsel cite another case, decided by the same court, which needs no comment at our hands to show that it does not sustain their contention. We simply quote all that is said in the brief of counsel in reference to that case, italicizing the salient feature thereof. "In a California case, a stockholder suing in behalf of the corporation recovered certain funds from defaulting directors. The concluding paragraph of the opinion is: 'The order is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter the order prayed for, after making reasonable allowance to the plaintiff, Chetwood, for his costs, disbursements, attorney's fees in the said action, as contemplated by law.' [Chetwood v. California Nat. Bank, 113 Cal. 649, 45 Pac. 854.]" In Davis v. Gemmell, 73 Md. 530, 21 Atl. 712, cited by plaintiffs in error "minority stockholders of a corporation brought a bill to prevent an asset of the corporation from being appropriated by the majority stockholder to his own use," and obtained a cancelation of a fraudulent assignment of the same by the majority stockholder to third parties. The asset in question was a judgment against a railroad company, which "was required to and did bring into court the greater portion of the amount due on the judgment." The parties to the case, including the corporation owning the judgment, "consented that the funds should be distributed" by the court under the proceedings pending therein; and the court, in distributing the fund, allowed and required the counsel fees incurred by the minority stockholders to be paid out of the fund. Certainly there is a very wide difference between the facts in that case and those in the case in hand. There the wrong which was righted, through the suit prosecuted by the minority stockholders, was a fraudulent conversion by the majority stockholder of valuable property belonging to the corporation, which was recovered for the corporation, and the fund derived therefrom was in court for distribution. Nothing more need be said to show that the principle deducible from that case does not control in the one which we have under consideration. Counsel for plaintiffs in error quote from Kernaghan v. Williams, L. R. 6 Eq. 228, some remarks of Lord Romilly, M. R. (at page 231), in delivering the opinion of the court: "If Mr. Williams [a complainant minority stockholder] is right in the suit which he has instituted, he will obtain a decree, and he will obtain, as the results of the suit, the costs; if he is not right, then he will not; and this, unquestionably, is certain,—that, if he succeeds, when the suit is over the company cannot come and claim the amount of funds recovered by that suit for their benefit, without paying the expenses incurred." We fail to see the relevancy of this citation. The question whether the corporation could be compelled by the court to pay the necessary expenses incurred by the minority stockholder in the suit which he had instituted was not directly involved in that case, and the opinion of the master of the rolls as to the rule which would be applied in the event certain contingencies with reference to that suit should occur is a well-recognized one, and not in conflict with the views which we have expressed. In the present case the corporation has not come forward to claim anything as the result of the suit instituted by the minority stockholders, and, if it had, it would have found nothing to claim, for no fund or property has been recovered. Another case to which we are referred is Florida Internal Improv. Co. v. Greenough, 105 U. S. 527, 28 L. ed. 1157. There a large holder of the bonds of a railroad company brought suit, in behalf of himself and the other bondholders, against the trustees of a fund which was pledged for the payment of the interest accruing on the bonds and instalments of the sinking fund for meeting the principal, "to rescue that fund from waste and destruction arising from the neglect and misconduct of the trustees, and to bring it into court for administration according to the purposes of the trust;" and all this was done, at great expense and trouble on the part of the complainant, and the other bondholders came in "and participated in the benefits resulting from his proceedings." The decision, allowing the complainant his counsel fees and other necessary expenses of litigation out of the fund in court, rests upon the principle announced in the third headnote to the case,—that "a trust fund must bear the necessary expenses of its administration." The case of Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Pettus, 113 U. S. 116, 28 L. ed. 915, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 387, also relied on by plaintiffs in error, where "the property was brought under the direct control of the court, to be administered for all entitled to share the fruits of the litigation," and where the solicitors of the complainants were "allowed reasonable compensation in respect of the demands of unsecured creditors (other than their immediate clients), who filed their claims" and shared in the common benefits secured to their class through the suit instituted and successfully prosecuted by the complainants, was held to fall within the principle announced in the Greenough Case. It is very apparent to us that neither of these two cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States affords authority for sustaining the contention of the plaintiffs in error. One marked difference between them and the case in hand is, as before remarked, that here no trust fund or property has been brought under the control and administration of the court; and another is that in each of those cases the plaintiff or plaintiffs sued for an entire class, the other members of which came forward and participated in the fund which had been recovered for all. Because the building of this belt line would have been an ultra vires act on the part of the corporation, we do not think it necessarily follows that the funds of the company invested therein would have been dissipated or lost. So far as we are informed, if the belt line had been built and operated by the company the enterprise might or might not have proved to be a profitable one. It is urged in one of the briefs for the plaintiffs in error that, if this belt road had been built, the corporation would have been in danger of having its entire charter forfeited on suit by the attorney general. There would have been no danger from this source; for the state, through its appropriate department, having granted the application for the amendment to the charter, which, if valid, would have authorized this action by the corporation, could not, after the corporation had exercised the powers which the state purported to confer upon it, have forfeited the charter because of the exercise of those powers. The minority stockholders, who had not consented to the amendment to the charter, had the right to complain when the corporation undertook to exercise powers which the amendment purported to confer upon it; but the state, which had, so far as it could, granted the amendment, could not complain.

It is claimed that the action brought by the plaintiffs "resulted in having returned to the treasury of the company a large sum amounting to about $55,000, which had been expended in carrying forward the illegal project before suit was brought," and that at least as to this sum, they are entitled to have their attorney's fees paid by the corporation. Suppose, in consequence of the plaintiffs' suit, a large sum of money which had been expended in the ultra vires undertaking was returned by the directors of the company to its treasury; it was not brought into court, and from thence returned to the company's treasury, nor did the court do anything whatever to compel its return. The court did nothing but grant an injunction restraining the company from building the belt railroad, and thus preventing any further expenditure of the company's money thereon. The court did not deal with the money which had already been spent, and its return to the company's treasury, so far as the court was concerned, was purely voluntary. The plaintiffs neither sued to recover, nor did they seek to compel the return of, any money belonging to the corporation, and the only legal result of their suit was the injunction.

Judgment affirmed.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Ware County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's minor child. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Chisholm & Clay for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Leon A. Wilson, for defendant in error:

When a child of tender years commits a mere technical trespass, and is injured by agencies that to an adult would be open and obvious warnings of danger, but not such to a child, he is not debarred from recovering if the things instrumental in his injury were left exposed and unguarded, and were of such a character as to be likely to attract children, excite their curiosity, and lead to their injury while they were pursuing their childish instincts. Such dangerous and attractive instrumentalities become an invitation by implication.

The company had notice that children frequented the place. The homicide was, within the ordinary probable sequence of events, a result of defendant's negligence. It might reasonably have been anticipated. There was danger of its happening, such as an ordinarily careful person might have apprehended, and would be likely to apprehend, as a possible result of any relaxation of diligence and care.

Fish, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A. A. Beavers obtained a verdict and judgment against the Savannah, Florida, & Western Railway Company for the death of his minor child, and, upon the defendant's motion for a new trial being overruled, it excepted. There was but little conflict in the evidence, and that in behalf of the plaintiff conduced to establish the following facts: The defendant railway company undertook to construct a water tank upon its premises. The work was temporarily suspended, and an excavation 12 feet square, about 7 feet deep, and containing about 4 or 5 feet of muddy water, concealing its depth, was left uncovered, and guarded only by piling placed around it, some 18 inches in height. Upon the sides of the excavation, and 2 feet from the surface, there was a ledge or sill, 5 by 10 inches. There was a ladder and a long handled pump left in the excavation, the ladder extending to the top. Near by there was a tram road upon which there was a small flat car, used for hauling away dirt taken from the hole. Eight and a half feet from the edge of the excavation, and along the outer line of the defendant's right of way, there ran a foot-path, much traveled by the public. Some 28 feet from the excavation there was a canal, along the banks of which there were berries and flowers, which children were accustomed to gather. There were no flowers nor berries immediately about the excavation. It did not appear that the officers of the defendant company knew that children frequented the locality. The foreman of the "gang," while making the excavation, saw children gathering flowers and berries along the banks of the canal and observing the progress of the work, but of this he never informed the officers of the company. No one lived nearer to the excavation than 100 yards, and the plaintiff resided 400 or 500 yards away. The public street was about 100 yards distant therefrom. Plaintiff's two sons, one nine and the other five and a half years old, went, with two other boys, the elder of whom was eleven years of age, to the excavation to play with frogs, and while the younger son of plaintiff was standing on the ledge, inside the hole, engaged in such childish sport, he fell into the water, and was drowned. All of these boys had been playing with the frogs in the excavation for several days prior to the accident, but there was no evidence that any of the company's officials had knowledge of this fact. A day or two before the accident a man passing by warned these boys to get away from the excavation or they would get hurt. In going to this place the boys did not use the footpath. Neither plaintiff nor his wife knew of the existence of the excavation.

Under the facts stated, was the defendant company liable in damages to the plaintiff for the death of his child? This question turns upon another; that is, whether or not the company owed the child any legal duty which it neglected to perform, for there can be no actionable negligence without the breach of a legal duty. The rule is too well settled to need the citation of authority that a landowner is under no duty to have his land in a safe condition for an adult trespasser to enter thereon. Such a trespasser has ordinarily no remedy for an injury happening to him by reason of the condition of the property upon which he intrudes. He takes the risk of the condition of the premises. Nor is the owner bound to warn him of nonapparent dangers, provided they were not prepared with intent to harm trespassers. Is there any difference in the case of a child entering upon the premises without the permission of the owner? There is an irreconcilable conflict of authority, in this country at least, upon the question, and it is not easily determined which way the weight of authority inclines. There are many decisions by courts of great respectability to the effect that "when a child of tender years commits a mere technical trespass, and is injured by agencies that to an adult would be open and obvious warnings of danger, but not so to a child, he is not debarred from recovering, if the things instrumental in his injury were left exposed and unguarded, and were of such a character as to be likely to attract children, excite their curiosity, and lead to their injury, while they were pursuing their childish instincts. Such dangerous and attractive instrumentalities become an invitation by implication." 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 403, 404. On the other hand, there are numerous cases wherein courts of the highest respectability enunciate the doctrine that an owner or occupier of land is ordinarily under no obligation to a trespasser so far as concerns the condition of his premises, and the fact that the trespasser is an infant of tender years affords no reason for modifying this rule, and charging the owner or occupier of land with a duty which does not otherwise exist; and, if for more beneficial user he creates upon his premises an instrumentality which happens to be attractive to children, he does not thereby extend to them an implied invitation to enter thereon. The tendency of the more recent decisions seems to be in favor of the doctrine last mentioned, and we are of opinion that, upon principle, it is the stronger side of the question. The principle involved has been so frequently and elaborately discussed by learned jurists that it is unnecessary to do more than refer to some of the decisions which are particularly applicable to the case which we have under consideration. Before doing so, however, we take the liberty of making a somewhat extended quotation from a monograph in 11 Harvard Law Review, pp. 349-373, 434-448, by the Hon. Jeremiah Smith, formerly one of the justices of the supreme court of New Hampshire, wherein the subject, "Liability of Landowners to Children Entering without Permission," is very learnedly and exhaustively treated. In maintaining the proposition that the landowner is under no duty, so far as concerns the condition of his premises, to intruding children, that eminent jurist says: "Assuming, then, that the law is not only settled, but is also consistent, in holding that the owner of land is not liable for the condition of his premises to an adult who enters without permission, the next inquiry is, What difference is there between the case of the adult intruder and the child intruder? Are there considerations which do not exist in the case of the adult, and which, when put into the scale, ought to turn the balance in favor of the child? The two prominent arguments are: (1) That the child is innocent; (2) that the child is incapable of protecting itself. What force is to be allowed to these considerations, and do they, when estimated at their true value, outweigh the reasons against imposing liability upon the landowner? . . . Of course, the innocence of a plaintiff does not, per se establish the fault of a defendant. The landowner cannot be liable unless he owed to the child a duty which he has neglected. Should the law, in view of the innocence of the child, impose on the landowner the duty here in controversy? No doubt there are cases where a defendant is rightly held liable to a child plaintiff when he would not be liable to an adult plaintiff under similar circumstances. Where it is admitted that a duty exists to use care to avoid harm to both children and adults, e. g., in the use of the public highway), then, in point of fact, more care may be required towards a child than towards an adult. In view of the child's helplessness and unconsciousness of danger, more care may, as matter of fact, be required under the unvarying legal rule, of 'due care under the circumstances,' just 54 L. R. A.
